Whether the first man on earth was really a man, or only a monad capable of becoming a man, does not affect this contention. That man or monad had life and intelligence, actual and potential, and back of that man or monad stood a Something, a life-giving and intelligent First Cause. The life and intelligence which has acted on earth for untold ages had its origin in an antecedent Life. The Theists, and the anti-materialists of every school, have written Q. E. D. at this point, and no atheist or devotee of a purely material philosophy has ever discovered a sponge with which to rub it out. A few spasmodic attempts have been made to do so, such as Bastian's experiments at spontaneous generation and Huxley's prodigious fiasco in explaining the fabled Bathibyus. But these pet idols of a purely materialistic cult have met the fate of all the false and impotent gods of ancient and modern times, from Dagon to Bathibyus, when once brought to face the Living God.

But an objection or two must be noted which have been offered to the position herein maintained, and I select them from Prof. J. S. Loveland's article in The Progressive Thinker, No. 654. I do this, not to attack him personally, but simply because his article is yet fresh in mind and because the ideas he advanced are not his alone but are the stock expressions of a class. He says:

"All substance is eternal. In it exist atoms, molecules, tendencies, forces, which necessitate motion, which (this second which is a little obscure but refers no doubt to motion)—which, with attraction and repulsion, cause endless succession of forms."

There now! Moses said: "In the beginning, God." Modern philosophical thought is to the same effect, viz: In the beginning, Mind, Life, Intelligence. You observe how much clearer, more simple and reasonable is the statement of Prof. Loveland. We are in search of a cause, yea, a First of causes. It is true the Professor says in the fourth column "there could be no such thing as a first cause." But in the quotation under consideration he says, "atoms, molecules, tendencies, forces * * * which, with attraction and repulsion, cause endless succession of forms."

So there was a cause after all.

Was it a living, intelligent cause? This is what the Professor vehemently and desperately denies. He says that matter, not mind, is causative, or the cause of things. Here are two or three of his sentences. "The prima facie evidence, addressing both matter and intellect, proclaims material causation." "The prima facie evidence declared that causation belonged to matter, and that mind was limited and controlled by matter." And more to the same effect.

His effort is to get rid of an intelligent cause at the beginning of things, to get things started and to keep them going without help of an intelligent Power. So he dismisses God, or Infinite Intelligence, with a scant degree of courtesy and calls our attention to his scientific substitute, a little bantling which he hopes will account for the presence of mind in matter and other abstruse problems. Behold, then, this substitute for God, this little idol worshiped by a man who sneers at Infinite Intelligence. Look at it! "Atoms, molecules, tendencies, forces, which necessitate motion, which, together with attraction and repulsion, cause endless succession of forms."

Does this collection of items then, all of which he says exist in matter or substance, really "cause endless succession of forms?" Let us analyze a little. "Atoms, molecules," are the first items mentioned as "existing in substance." We may say rather, and better, they not only exist in, they are substance itself. With this correction we will take the next. "Tendencies and forces, attraction and repulsion." Very well: these are elements which "exist in" substance. We agree to that: they are, and were, there without a doubt. But I insist on closer definitions. "Tendencies and forces" is a glittering generality. Practically it means nothing. What is a tendency? What kind of force does he mean? He tells us grandiloquently that there are "tendencies and forces in matter." Of course. The "force" of gravity is in matter. As a result of this force the "atoms and molecules" have a "tendency" to fall to a common center. We have also, in substance, cohesion, chemical affinity, hardness, ductility, etc. Then there is electricity, magnetism and the like. Does gravity, electricity, chemical affinity, produce forms?

Will the "force" of gravity impart intelligence to a clod? Will an electric current passed through a handful of dirt endow it with life and thought?

The matter, or substance, in my town-lot has "in it, tendencies, force, attraction and repulsion," but they do not "cause an endless succession of forms." There is a "tendency" to produce weeds after the soil is filled with seed and not before. All of the "tendency, force, attraction and repulsion" has not, cannot, and never did cause a form, either vegetable or animal, to come forth unless from a seed or life-germ previously placed there.

If a "tendency, force, which necessitates motion," aided by "attraction and repulsion," caused an "endless succession of forms" to appear at one time, why don't they still show activity by producing a few forms in cases where there is no antecedent life?

If the Professor will capture a tendency, mate it with an attraction or repulsion, secure a little aid from force, any old force, and cause one form to appear independent of a seed, or life germ, I will give up the contention. Until such time, all talk of mere material forces, attractions and repulsions, causing forms to appear, will be regarded as merely the "tendency" of some men to talk nonsense.

The fact is, the "tendencies, forces, attractions and repulsion, in substance, are necessary to the growth, development and preservation of an endless succession of living forms, but they do not, and never did, originate those forms and endow them with life and intelligence. Matter, or substance as he incorrectly terms it, forms nothing, acts on nothing, but is itself formed, molded, acted upon.

Once more he says: "In the great processes of evolution effects transcended their causes." That is to say, an effect may be greater than the cause that produced it. It is necessary to say this in order to bolster up the previous statement. If an effect can be greater than its cause, then possibly a mere "tendency" in a lifeless and thoughtless clod may have produced another clod that had both life and thought. Of course! How reasonable that an effect can be greater than its cause. Then the whole of anything can be greater than the sum of its parts. A child may be born of greater size than its mother. A pop-gun may throw a thousand pound shell and thus render useless a monster cannon. The scientist who seeks to know the mighty powers of the cyclone which wrecked a city are on the wrong track. It was a gentle zephyr no doubt, a mere puff of air, that demolished those huge structures. How reasonable according to the Loveland text-book on physics which is authority for the statement that an effect can transcend its cause.

No, I am not ready to accept the dictum of such a writer. Intelligence had a better origin than a mere "tendency," or a "force" in some far primeval clod or drop of ooze in the ocean's shiny depths.

Fatal Superstitions.

A curious example of the power of suggestion over a superstitious mind has just been told me by a man whose name is too well known to be mentioned. He tells the story as his reason for refusing to play cards these days:

"Several years ago," says he, "I was a member of a house party at a clubhouse in the mountains of Pennsylvania. One evening a man who made his home at the club-house suggested a game of poker. We made it a five-handed game, the ideal number for a poker game, I think, and we adjourned to the man's room to play. Besides the man who suggested the game, the party was made up of his wife, who sat at his left; a lady from Washington, who sat at his right; one other man and myself. The man—I'll call him B.—was a jovial fellow, with not an ounce of superstition in his makeup, so far as I knew. We played for an hour or so, and the deal came around to the Washington woman. She shuffled as prettily as any woman I ever saw, but as she gave the cards to fillip, the 4 of spades flew out of the pack and fell to the floor, at the feet of the man to her left. He picked it up for her, and she said, laughingly:

"'You oughtn't to have picked that card up. It's the death card. It fell in your room, at your feet, and you picked up bad luck when you touched it.'

"B. laughed, but from that minute he began to lose. I was surprised to see how badly he took his ill-luck, for we were playing penny ante, 5-cent limit, and he couldn't lose but a few cents, no matter what cards he held. The Washington woman bantered him a great deal about the unlucky death card, till he grew actually peevish. Later in the game, after the deal had gone around several times, it came to him, and again the 4 of spades fell at his feet as he shuffled the pack.

"'Worse and worse,' laughed the Washington woman. 'The death card's yours for keeps now.'

"B. didn't speak, drew one card and bet all the chips he had. He won the pot on a straight, and the 4 of clubs was in it. I never knew whether it was the one card he had drawn that time or not, for he got up from the table and refused to play any more. We joked him about 'cold feet,' and about quitting as soon as he had made his stake back, but he didn't take it in good part. He left us all feeling decidedly uncomfortable. Just at daylight his wife aroused the house with her frantic screams. B. was found dead in bed, and I firmly believe he died of fright. The doctor said heart disease, but I'm convinced that the worry over that foolish 4 of spades brought on the attack of heart failure. I always deny that I'm superstitious, but perhaps I am, for since that evening I've never been able to bring myself to touch cards again."

"That reminds me of a singular death which occurred in an Ohio town," said a man who had listened to the death-card story. "There was a physician in the town who, through no fault of his own, had incurred the enmity of a half-crazed woman who blamed him for the death of her husband. She threatened again and again to kill him, and once she tried to shoot him in his office. The doctor kept the matter hushed up, naturally, but it worried his wife desperately. The half-demented woman declared that if she couldn't kill the doctor with a weapon she would do it by her prayers. One night the doctor was roused from sleep by the ringing of the telephone bell. The telephone was on a landing half-way up the stairs. The doctor got up to answer the call.

"'If it's that crazy woman, don't talk to her,' his wife called after him. She heard him say, 'Hello,' and then 'yes,' and then he asked, 'Who is this?' It was evidently the mad woman who had called him up, for his wife heard him say, 'I can't talk to you now.' Then she heard him hang up the receiver. The next instant there was the noise of a horrible fall, and when the wife ran down she found her husband lying at the foot of the stairs. He had fallen only a few feet, but his neck was broken, and it has never been possible to dissuade his wife from her conviction that his half-mad enemy brought him to his death."—Washington Post.

An Incident That Illustrates Spirit Power.

Some years ago I was living in the town of Attleboro, Mass. We had there a Children's Progressive Lyceum, and were doing well (now there is none). My only son was a member at that time, about ten or perhaps eleven years of age. One Sunday the subject, "Conscience," was given out for the children to prepare essays upon, to be read the following Sunday. He came home, took a pencil and paper and wrote these lines:

"Conscience is a man's ruler, a kind of God which he has to obey or take the consequences. It is a kind of second nature which, if allowed to have its sway, a man could never go astray from the path of right. Conscience is made up of a person's sense of his or her duty to themselves, mankind, and the brute creation."

After writing the above, my little Harry came to me and showed me what he had written. He said: "I wrote as long as the power lasted, and then I had to stop." This to me was worthy of note.

Our home was often visited by the loved spirits from the higher spheres, and often those of a high order. I am sure that some one of them touched the sensitive brain of my child and tried to project the thoughts he put on the paper. Thus do they move in many and varied ways to impress truths upon the minds of earth's children, the only fault being ours—we fail to catch the vibrations which come to us from them; therefore, let us never condemn the dear ones who from time to time try so hard and persistently to reach out to us mortals dwelling on this mundane shore. They are with us, and to bless, ever striving to uplift us when cast down, and when weary with toil and trial, and ofttimes down-hearted and discouraged, they bend over us and strive to lift the cloud from our souls and bid us have courage to face the world, and fight life's battles anew.

Bad habits are as infectious by example as the plague itself is by contact.—Fielding.

DON'T THINK!

Don't Ask Questions! Don't Worry the Church!

One of the commandments should have read, Don't think. Another should have read: Don't ask questions. It is worse to ask questions than to think; for only one hears you think, whereas a great many may hear the question. Either habit gives trouble, and both combined is shameful; for it gives the church no end of bother.

It was very smooth sailing for the church in those earlier days when the people swallowed, without digestion, everything the church told them, and when the people had as little scientific knowledge as the biblical writers themselves. In those days the people didn't have to think and ask questions, for they didn't know how; didn't have the material. But, in these days of somewhat universally diffused scientific knowledge, those outside the church just have to think: the Lord built them that way. And when a man thinks, questions bubble up and out, if he doesn't become too full for utterance, or is not "scared of the courts."

That this thinking and questioning is uncomfortable for the church, must be the fault of the church itself; for if the church contentions rest on the firm foundations of truth, it could very well invite investigation.

The fundamental trouble with the church is that the world is much bigger to-day than in the days of the biblical writers—bigger because our knowledge of it is much broader. And the church must hold the world down to its proportions in the "inspired" mind, or the reputation of the "sacred" book for truth is smirched.

And the "God" of the world is correspondingly larger to-day than he was in the days of the biblical writers. But the church must also hold "God" down to his original proportions, or again the biblical account is smirched.

No wonder, therefore, that the church looks askance, or out of one corner of its eye, at science; for science gives the church much bother and necessitates much patch or crazy-quilt work by causing outsiders to think and ask hard questions. But hard as is science and reason on church people, common sense is perhaps harder. By the way, liberal churches have patched and repatched in obedience to reason, common sense and modern science, until it is now rather difficult to tell which is patch and which the original garment. Apparently the patches have it.

When we consider the dimensions of the world in the mind of Moses—the dimensions of "God" corresponding of course—we can't wonder that he had the earth created in six days, and that the sun, stars and other planets were hung out to give the earth more light. Man was the whole thing, and the Jew very nearly the whole thing. The Jews were "God's" chosen people, and the purpose was to make him a mighty people—to which end many miraculous things were done in his favor. As man was the whole thing, and "God" specially good and loving to him for that reason, he was created perfect in the beginning and placed in a perfect environment. The devil tempted him and he fell, and after some four thousand years, "God" sent his only son to save man. Still the great majority go the broad road. In the run of events, "God" at one time had pumped in an extra supply of water from some unknown source and drowned out all antediluvian people who were not in the ark, for the reason that these people had not panned out as the "omniscient" God expected them to do. No, not all; for, according to the Septuagint, Methuselah lived some years after the flood, and as he was not in the ark he must have waded. This may seem incredible to some, but it must be remembered that Methuselah was a man of powerful constitution. We have sometimes thought this yarn was nearly as tough as that about the dry bones.

We have inadvertently said something about patch or crazy-quilt work. This work is of two kinds: that done by liberal churches in obedience to reason, common sense, and the facts of modern science; and that done by the scriptural writers themselves. The orthodox churches do not hold themselves responsible for the patchwork done by liberal churches, and, in fact, are inclined to class these with the infidels. But orthodox people make up for that by holding on like grim death to the crazy-quilt work of the biblical writers. For these there is nothing inconsistent in an "omniscient" and "omnipotent" God going about the creation of the world as though he didn't know just how to do it and how to experiment till he got the hang of the thing. Nothing inconsistent in creating the entire universe for man's benefit. Nothing inconsistent in a "God" being so tired after six days' labor that he had to rest on the seventh. Nothing inconsistent in a perfect man and woman in a perfect environment falling from grace. Nothing inconsistent in creating a devil who caused all men, in Adam, to fall, and then sending his only son to lift them up, with very indifferent success. Nothing inconsistent in an omniscient, omnipotent and om-loving-good God creating a world chock full of evil and evil propensities and evil influences. Nothing inconsistent in this good and loving God doing everything that is done, both good and bad. Oh, no! They may not be able to see just how the patches can be made to fit in, but that is their fault—the patches are all right. And the man who doubts it, especially if he thinks out loud by asking questions, ought not to wait for damnation till he reaches the next world, but should have a foretaste from the courts.

There is not space in this effusion to say much about the patchwork done by liberal churches to have the crazy-quilt work done by scriptural writers tolerated by this scientific age. Perhaps it is not necessary; for the orthodox world rates these very little higher than Spiritualists, materialists, secularists, agnostics and all that "gang." And I conceive that orthodox people for once are not very far wrong; for to be of the church you must believe in the God of Israel, the God of the Bible. That is, you must believe that God did all those remarkable things found in the Biblical narrative, and with the motives or purposes imputed to him in the doing. This, I understand, liberal church people do not do. They seem even inclined to set Christ down as simply the teacher of sound moral principles, who died at the hands of those adversely affected by the proposed reformation—on the same principle that men are sometimes now punished for asking questions which it is not convenient for the church to answer.

When the liberal church patches out the six ordinary days evidently meant by Moses, into six long creative periods, what becomes of the Sabbath? If man is to rest only in each seventh period, it is a long time between drinks, and many there be who would not get even a smell.

But perhaps the most extraordinary patch laid on is that by the eminent reverend who attempted to account for God's sending his only son to save man; when, in the light of modern science, the probabilities are that every planet and star have legal voters who need saving just as bad. The patch was that the people of the earth were the only people accredited with a devil, or allowed to fall, and God did it to give those other fellows an object lesson in the awfulishness of sin. There was man made to suffer that others might be benefited, which hardly tallies with the claim made up to that time, that man was the specially beloved of God for whom all things were done. In fact quite a lot of questions bubble up. Why should any people fall heir to a devil and sin? How were those other fellows going to see the object lesson? And what good would it do them? It was not their fight. To be of any service, God must intend sending them a devil later on, and they'll know how to fight him, and what the consequences will be if they don't knock the very socks off him right on the start.

This divine must think he is talking to the 12th century, and that it is therefore entirely safe to put through himself just any old rubbish in the name of religion. He does not seem to realize at all that The Progressive Thinker has its eye on him. He should take The Progressive Thinker so as to "see himself as others see him." The average parson loses a very great deal by not taking the liberal papers. They might learn him to think, which no doubt is the very thing he doesn't want to learn. It is what he needs, however.

RENDING THE VAIL.

Some Incidents Recorded Therein.

On page 466 of Wm. W. Aber's book, "Rending the Vail," I find a communication from Judge Wm. R. Wagstaff, who resided at Paola, Miami county, Kansas, and was judge of his judicial district, several years prior to 1880, but for some years has been a resident in spirit life.

As it was my good fortune to have met the Judge while on earth, and also to have been well acquainted with his wife in early days, I take unusual pleasure in giving a hearing.

A fairly good portrait of the Judge is also given. He says:

"My friends, I knew little of Spiritualism before I died, so I shall not call death a transition.

"I did not want to leave the body, but the summons of Nature must be obeyed, and I laid aside my mortal body and took that of the spirit.

"The fear of death is the result of false teaching and ignorance.

"My death was really painless, and I am led to believe that all are the same. The individual may be suffering a great deal of pain before death really takes hold of him, but when death really comes, I think there is no pain.

"I felt like a stranger in a strange land when I first awoke in the spirit life, but one after another of my old friends came around me and talked to me of the place I was in; it seemed like old times to hear myself greeted by the old familiar name, William.

"It was hard for me to realize what kind of a place I was in. It was entirely different from any kind of a heaven I had ever read of. Everything seemed as material to me as when I was living. My friends, many of them, had beautiful homes with every comfort.

"I have been to this circle a number of times, and have listened attentively, to all that has been said.

"I know that some of you wonder why the spirits seem to make contradictory statements in regard to the spirit world.

"I think it must be just as it is on earth: Two people may be driving along a country lane, and one will notice the condition of the wheat and corn, and the other, perhaps, will only see the trees and flowers; and, if you should ask these people what they saw in their drive, how widely different their descriptions would be!—and still both would be true.

"My home has improved much since I came to live in it, and I find that it improves as I myself improve.

TWO GREAT CAMPS.

A Visit to Chesterfield and Lily Dale.

After an interesting week at Chesterfield—my third visit to that camp—I reached home Saturday evening, July 26, to find Mrs. Howe about as I left her, busy with household affairs. She is feeble, and the only reason she is not sick in bed, enjoying the inspiration of a good nurse and doctor qualified to poison scientifically, is because she has not time to be sick, and I am in the same fix. Some pessimists have had me laid out ready for the undertaker for several years, but I am a lively corpse, and propose to work for 10 years yet.

Sunday morning the brother of Mrs. Wood, of Lily Dale, called to engage me for the funeral rites of his sister, monday at 3 p. m. This was a sad shock to us. In her cottage we have spent many pleasant seasons, and the last days our Maudie spent at camp were in Mrs. Woods' cottage. Her visible absence will be deeply and sadly realized by hundreds who have shared her cheery home, and the sunshine of her social life, while we look through the mists of sense to the splendors of her new life and supernal home. Mrs. Richmond offered an invocation, thrilled with tender thoughts and uplifting spirituality.

I missed the address of Hon. A. B. Richmond, Monday forenoon, which I much regretted. He is hale and happy as a boy. I heard part of the very able and interesting discourse of Rev. F. A. Wiggin Sunday afternoon, which enthused the large audience and emphasized the spiritual significance of Spiritualism.

Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader is here, and I just heard her say that she likes this beautiful camp better than any other place she was ever in in her whole life.

Prof. Lockwood's class lecture Tuesday morning was rich and strong. I would like to report some of the strong expressions it contained; but will not attempt to give it now. But it was victuals, drink and lodging to the prepared intellect.

Prof. McDonald sang in his charming style. He must be heard to be appreciated.

I have not eaten at a better table anywhere than that which invites the appetite at Hotel Grand, under the management of E. R. Abbott. The cooking is exquisitely fine and inspiring to the most exacting taste and hygienic critic, and the attentions prompt and cheerful.

Here I meet my old-time friends, A. Gratton Smith, of Painesville, Ohio, and H. L. Tibbals, who took the first prize in the national contest for the best picture of President Garfield many years ago. Reminiscences of loyal friends and friendships are not only pleasant, but full of psychic benefits as well.

Here, too, is that remarkable man, ex-member of Congress and founder and for many years editor of the Kansas City Journal, Col. R. T. Van Horn, who is a live Spiritualist, never ashamed of his faith, and has no apology to offer for believing in mediums and all phases of manifestations of phenomena.

Here, too, I was surprised to find Mrs. Fixen of Chicago, whose lively presence at Bankson's Lake added so much to the social cheer of those dark, rainy days.

Eber W. Bond is also taking in Lily Dale, appreciating the many good things constantly being realized within these sanctified grounds. Do not be startled at the word sanctified. It is not the Jewish Jehovah that gives it the holy aura, but the intellectual baptisms of our Wrights, Lockwoods, Richmonds, Wigginses, Watsons and others, and the spiritual quickenings and moral vitality that fall upon it, like celestial manna filtered through the gloom and distilled in the sweet silences that invite the emotions of growing souls.

A word or two of Chesterfield. There was much that transpired during the week I was there, July 19 to 26, worthy of being reported and made a part of the world's intellectual treasures. Jennie H. Brown, of Fort Worth, Texas, did active work, improvised poems, one on three subjects presented by the audience, in which she and a friend she selected to co-operate, gave alternate stanzas, each responsive to the thought of the other, and to the questions as given. This appeared to be a surprise to many—a novelty equal to any other platform phenomena.

J. H. Mendenhall, who for fifty years has been writing books and pamphlets, and delivering public addresses, said he had never been so impressed by any platform work, as he was Sunday, July 20, when Mrs. Brown and Prof. Harrison D. Barrett were the favorite speakers, and Mrs. Ropp gave tests from the platform.

I was especially impressed with the uniform kindness shown me by all, which was a physical tonic and rest, and a mental support and inspiration, long to be remembered. President Hillgoss was genial and generous; Miss Flora Hardin affable, entertaining, bright and cheerful, and her frank outspoken style and truthful sincerity impressed me as a noble sample of representative character, such as Spiritualism endorses and cultivates.

Mrs. Harbin, of Indianapolis, is in much favor as a reliable medium. Mr. Carver, from Southern Kansas, whom I knew at Liberal, Mo., nine years ago, told me she gave him the best test of his lifetime.

Mr. Finney, of Grand Rapids, Mich., seemed to be doing a good work, and he certainly did me a good turn by his strong magnetic treatments.

The new auditorium is a splendid building and much admired. The trolley lines from Anderson to Muncie, via Chesterfield, are the best I have found anywhere and make about 35 miles an hour.

I was profoundly impressed with the experience and noble character of two soldiers from the National Home, whose joy in the new life they find in Spiritualism was a benediction to witness.

Mr. Cunningham said within the three years since he found this light he had enjoyed more than in all his life before, and his fellow soldier, whose name I forget, testified in like manner. Together they arranged for one to go with me to Muncie—15 miles—and see me to the train, and they paid the fare on the trolley, and would take no reward. They glowed with the light and love of the spiritual gospel, and exemplified its highest teachings.

Chesterfield is a splendid camp, and thousands throng the grounds every pleasant Sunday.

CULTIVATION OF THE FEELINGS.

An Inquiry Concerning the Relation of the Feelings to the Sense of Reality.

HINTS THAT THE THOUGHTFUL MIND WILL DO WELL TO CONSIDER WHILE SOJOURNING ON THE MATERIAL PLANE.

The subject of the relation of force and phenomena—of cause and effect—in regard to human activities, is one of supreme importance to mankind in the solution of life's problems; one that has hitherto been ignored, but is now beginning to arrest the attention of those who are searching for further light on this subject. It is one that deserves the most careful consideration and the most emphatic declaration in research.

Turning the eye of reason upon man's past experience, he tries to measure the value of that collection of feeling and beliefs of which he finds himself possessed; and the first thing he discovers is their character—a mass of incongruous materials, a congeries of unreasoned opinions which he knows not when nor how they were formed. Its elements have been put together under all kinds of influences, without any conscious intellectual process; therefore, we can have no assurance of them.

In order that we may have such assurance, we must unweave the web of experience which we have unconsciously woven, that we may begin anew in order to obtain a clear and distinct consciousness of what we really are. We must free ourselves by a decisive effort from the weight of custom, prejudice and tradition with which our consciousness is overlaid, or rather, in which it is involved, and begin anew under the guidance of reason and demonstrated facts. The method of doubt is the sine qua non in this new process, for doubt must precede inquiry. The rule is, the force of custom, prejudice and tradition is regarded as a finality; and what is felt to be real is, for the time being, to the individual, a reality to which he is bound to adhere, and which he feels he must maintain.

Careful observation and recorded experience of others will show that whatever one has been most in contact with, has most aroused and brought into activity certain feelings or states of consciousness. These grow and are developed by the stimulus of environments. Much light can be thrown upon this subject by the quotation of a few paragraphs from an article in the Metaphysical Magazine for July, 1896, which contains the utterances of Prof. Elmer Gates regarding his experiments in Psycho-Physics. He says:

"My experiments prove that the mind activities create the structures which the mind embodies or manifests....The process must begin with the first stages of brain-building and be pursued systematically to the higher stages in order to create in the brain those structures which govern different portions of the body. [What a lesson is here for parents in the development of the brain structure of their children!] But the potentialities contained within the mind must be manifested, one by one, from the least to the greatest. While the mind is manifesting what is within, it can do this on the material plane only through the outer forms. It builds for itself forms and structures through which it can express what it sees....

"In 1879, I published a report of experiments showing that when the breath of a patient was passed through a tube cooled with ice so as to condense the volatile qualities of the respiration, the iodide of rhodopsin mingled with those condensed products, produced an observable precipitate. But within five minutes after the patient became angry, there appeared a brownish precipitate which indicates the presence of a chemical compound produced by the emotions.

"This compound extracted and administered to men and animals caused stimulation and excitement.

"Extreme sorrow, such as mourning for the loss of a child recently deceased, produced a gray precipitate; remorse, a pink precipitate, etc.

"My experiments show that irascible, malevolent and depressing emotions generate in the system injurious compounds, some of which are extremely poisonous; also that agreeable, happy emotions generate chemical compounds of nutritious value which stimulate the cells to manufacture energy.

"I have succeeded in entirely eliminating vicious propensities from children with dispositions towards cruelty, stealing or anger. In curing a bad habit, I would for every evil tendency, image or arousing, existing in some part of the brain, create a greater number of the opposite kind of memories, and keep them active a greater number of times each day, until the old structure had disappeared and new ones had been formed.

"The process does not require the assent of the patient any further than to take the course of studies.

"He may not desire to abandon a certain habit or practice; yet, by the force of brain building, that motive can be eliminated.

"It is possible in three months' time to develop structures which will cause a patient to feel disgust for what he had previously relished and desired."

The above stated experiments demonstrate two important facts: (1) That the feelings grow and are developed by their exercise, creating brain structures to give them expression; and (2), that the feelings give rise to certain substances which, acting on the nervous system, produce various states of consciousness corresponding to the character of the feelings that give rise to them. These great facts demand the most serious consideration.

What is accomplished by the operation of these principles unconsciously in childhood and youth, and without their recognition, and therefore determined by the prevailing customs, prejudices and traditions, may by their recognition and application, be so directed as to result in the greatest good and benefit to mankind, instead of, as now, in conditions in which man's worst enemy is man; giving rise to war, despotism, slavery, extremes of wealth and poverty, and all manner of crime.

The first essential thing to do is to recognize the relation between feeling and human conduct. Viewed in its right light, there is nothing more obvious; and yet, as a factor in the solution of life's problems, it is utterly ignored. It is strange that men do not recognize cause and effect in regard to feeling and conduct. Prof. Brann says: "These first forms of life all have a motive power—a propeller which carries them on to ever greater perfection to a more perfect development. And this propeller, this guide, is desire.

"Desire for what?

"Why, for nothing but growth, development, freedom and happiness." (Mastery of Fate, p. 21.)

Another writer, editor of Now, a journal of the latest evolution, says: "Consciousness has its rise in sensation. I feel, therefore, I am is the affirmation of life. I feel, therefore, I think is the affirmation of consciousness. We are conscious of being only because we feel. It is with feeling (sensation) alone that we deal. It is by feeling alone that we know. All phenomena begin and end with feeling. There is as far as the individual is concerned nothing but sensation. It is with myself alone that I deal. I can never know anything that I do not first feel; therefore, there is no universe to me except that which I feel. When I am non-existent, then there is as far as I am concerned only non-existence. All my knowledge, all my reasoning, all my duty lies with myself. I can know only self—can labor only for self.

"Once let a person grasp the meaning of these affirmations: I am, first, feeling; and it is only feeling that I know. Then and not till then, there is to him a possible mental science. Till then, it is a mental philosophy.

"Recognizing feeling as the only phenomenon with which we can deal, we shall begin to classify feelings; shall seek the origin of laws. From this will come a practice founded upon this science. This practice will be the art of thinking.

"Not until this view is taken and the practice of studying mental conditions takes the place of the attempt to study that which is not self, will there be any real science. When that time comes, there will be Man where there is now only the common mass of humanity." (Editorial in Now, for June, 1902.)

All science has its basis on facts. They are the revelators of all knowledge. It is as clear to any observing mind that human conduct is the effect of a cause, a cause that is as persistent, immutable and universal as any other cause in nature. It is with this cause we have to deal; but unlike all other causes whose phenomena have their rise in the external world, that which gives rise to human conduct is a conscious cause—an irrepressible desire to live, to enjoy, to be happy, from which arises a concern for our well-being and that of others. In other words, this desire is self love and the love of others; and the the concern for their well-being is in proportion to the love we feel for them.

The desire to be and enjoy is the mainspring of all human activities, the character of which is determined by that of the feelings that give rise to them. Since these desires (loves) are capable of growth, development, unfoldment, culture by means of external forces on these conscious feelings, it is of infinite importance that we realize this great fact and regard it as the underlying basis of ethical science and education.

The aim and purpose of this writing is to impress upon the mind the all-important fact that what one feels to be real is to him real as long as that feeling remains. This may not seem so important at first view; but the more it is examined, the more significant it will appear. This great fact was recognized by the ancients, but no practical use was made of it so far as is known. It has passed into a proverb, "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he."

But writers in modern times leave out the phrase "in his heart," because the theory is that thought is the power that controls, directs and regulates all human activities, and the purpose here is to show what it is that moves to all voluntary, rational activity.

A false theory when accepted as true, not only leads astray by the employment of what are supposed to be means, but excludes the possibility of acting in accordance with truth, and of employing the right means; hence we see the importance of the subject under consideration.

"In his heart" is a phrase in the way of this false theory; therefore it is stricken out. The word "heart," aside from physiological function, is always employed to express some kind of feeling. There are many words of which it is in part, compounded: as "generous-hearted," "hard-hearted," "heartless," and the like. Webster's second definition of this word (the first being its physical) is: "The seat of the affections or sensibilities, collectively or separately, as love, hate, joy, grief, courage, and the like; rarely the seat of the understanding or will; usually in a good sense when no epithet is expressed; the better or lovelier part of our nature; the spring of all our actions and purposes; the seat of moral life and character; the moral affections and character itself; the individual disposition and character, as a good, tender, loving, bad or selfish heart."

Then, in the light of this definition we can see the true meaning of the proverb. The thinking is the state of consciousness of the feeling expressed in the phrase "in his heart;" but this does not fit the accepted theory.

Spinoza recognized this fact in saying the illusion of the finite; the illusion of sense, of imagination and passion, is the source of all error and evil to man." The "illusion" is the false sentiment that seems a reality.

This "illusion" of sense, of imagination, of passion, is not only the source of error and evil, but in consequence, it gives rise to the sense of reality.

The heart, then, being "the spring of all our actions and purposes," having their rise in the feelings, and the feelings giving rise to the sense of reality, how can we think and act only in accordance with our feelings, whether they be good or bad?

The significance of this subject will now appear. The facts of human conduct reveal their cause; at first, involved and enfolded germs, waiting for growth, development, unfoldment, culture. This is effected by their exercise—that being the law of their development. These germs innate in man are the element of his constitution. When that exercise is duly, orderly, completely and harmoniously directed, the result will be at maturity the complete individual.

The various feelings, germinal at first, are perfectly adapted to all the needs and requirements of life, prompting to the supply of his material needs and wants and the unfoldment of his moral and spiritual nature.

Therefore, the rational and necessary method of the needed development and unfoldment is to so direct the right exercise of these feelings in their due order, at the right time and in the right manner. There is no other method for the accomplishment of this grand purpose.

There is not a moment in our conscious lives, but what we are subject to the stimulus of this exercise which is unconsciously developing and shaping our character, and is the means by which our destiny is fixed.

Thus we are the arbiters of our own fate.

The forces that impel us to action are within ourselves; but the stimulus that arouses the exercise is from without, and for us to create and direct. When this important fact is clearly apprehended, we will employ the right stimulus to bring into exercise the right feelings at the right time and in the right manner.

This of late has been termed Auto-Suggestion; that is, by a series of affirmations expressing what is good and desirable, and holding them in consciousness, and in the process of time the feelings that are thus developed and unfolded will dominate the life. Hitherto such suggestion had its rise in environments and unconsciously induced; and the affirmations were such as the feelings unconsciously suggested by their being aroused, were the most pleasing which were not often the most effectual in the development of good character.

It is a universal law of human conduct that the strongest feelings not only dominate the life but give rise to the sense of reality in what persons feel, whether the feeling be founded on truth or error, the feeling is alike strong and vigorous.

The fundamental law of human conduct, from which none escape, is this: Man employs every means at his command, and pursues every interest which he feels (and therefore thinks) will best satisfy his strongest desires and most effectually promote his welfare, present and future, and avoids as best he can those evils that he fears will bring him pain or misery.

When this law which all must obey is clearly apprehended and appreciated, the only thing to consider and determine is the character of the strongest desires and judgment in avoiding evil; for when the right feelings exist and are the stronger, there only remains the process of employing the right means at the time and in the right manner.

It is undeniable that the feelings that should dominate must be the moral sentiments and spiritual aspirations, under the control and sanction of which all other feelings must act.

The question of the feelings being thus disposed of, we have now to consider the question of means, for nothing in the way of satisfaction of desire can be accomplished without the employment of means.

Here the will is employed.

There is scarcely a word in our language that is more frequently employed, and as little understood as is this word. A careful analysis of it will disclose the fact that several elements are combined in its make-up. At first there is a desire or feeling that initiates the act, and gives rise to the motive; but the will has nothing to do with that; it deals only with the means with which the motive is concerned. There is first felt a determination to do; and the judgment is brought into requisition to discriminate as to the adequacy and application of means, and then a choice is made followed by action. This process is the will in operation. The motive requires (1) determination to accomplish; (2) judgment to discriminate; (3) choice in the employment of means—all actuated by desire seeking satisfaction. When the first is weak the act will not be vigorous and persistent; and if strong out of proportion the will is characterized by obstinacy; weakness of the second will result in vacillation, indecision, changeableness, often so defective as to cause failure; lack of choice results in loss of opportunity or neglect of means in the accomplishment of the act. But when all these elements are active and vigorous, and operate in harmony, the conduct will be of the same character as that of the desire or feeling that prompted the act.

Now, when that desire or feeling is right, the law above mentioned will in its operation inevitably bring the solution of all the problems of life. But whatever definition of the will may be given, it will fail to satisfy most people because their meaning of words and different states of feeling give rise to a different sense of reality in regard to the same subject. The only question remaining is, How shall the desired state of feeling be reached? Or, rather, what combination of feelings, so necessary to the accomplishment of life's true purposes can be secured? The elements are innate in the mental constitution; the capacity to comprehend is given to man; the irrepressible and persistent desire to enjoy and be happy, is the efficient incentive; but there is a mass of error and absurdities accepted as indisputable truths, and the feeling that is in them gives rise to the sense of their reality.

The lessons of childhood and youth, unconsciously imbibed, become so rooted and interwoven in the mental structure, that they are felt to be realities, without any regard whatever, to their verity or fallacy. Argument, reason and even demonstration are of no avail. The fact that any feeling, or whatever it may be founded, while it gives rise to a sense of reality of the thing felt, it does not give rise to the fact that the feeling is as likely to have a false as a true foundation. This fact is not even dreamed of; but it must be fully understood and appreciated as the first step in this great work. The rest will be easy to follow, but the non-recognition of it operates as an effectual barrier.

A few examples, familiar to all, will serve as illustrations of the foregoing facts and principles: One who had been born and brought up in the Southern states, felt that negro slavery was right and proper.

He was sincere and honest in the realization of that feeling.

The Mormons of Utah felt perfectly justified in the practice of polygamy.

The Jews were sincere and conscientious in offering sacrifices to appease the anger of Jehovah.

These are feelings that we regard as founded on error; yet that fact did not affect the vigor and intensity of their feelings.

The philanthropist feels the wrongs and injustice of oppressing the poor; a sense the oppressor does not feel.

The devout churchman feels the sense of reality in the atoning efficacy of Christ's blood; and so we might go on ad infinitum. They are all honest, conscientious and faithful to their sense of reality. What they do not know is to them as if it did not exist; and, of course, has no consideration with them. They are utterly oblivious to the fact that what they feel to be reality is no proof of its reality. The other fact is the sense of reality in persons having different feelings in the same subject, and having a different sense of their reality. This fact is ignored and loses its force on them.

HEAVEN AND HELL.

Not Places, but Spiritual Conditions.

There are plenty of ministers who have brains, and there are plenty of ministers who have reverence, but the ministers who are brainy without being cold, and reverential without being insipid are few.

The Rev. Dr. W. Hanson Pulsford, of the Church of the Messiah, Unitarian, combines intellect and heart, reason and emotion, in a way that is positively charming.

I heard Dr. Pulsford recently at the Memorial Chapel, Woodlawn avenue and Fifty-seventh street, and I am moved to say that as a preacher of the gospel which at one and the same time convinces the head and warms the heart Dr. Pulsford is without an equal in the city.

The sermon was a marvel of power, simplicity and inspiration, and before the last word of the wonderful discourse had fairly ceased to echo I found myself saying to myself: "It is a pity that every man and woman in Chicago could not have heard that sermon."

The doctor's theme was "Heaven and Hell," and during his forty minutes' talk on the subject there was not a second when one might not have heard a pin fall—so intensely interesting was the speaker's thought.

"Heaven and Hell are inward conditions," said the preacher, "not outward localities. The joy of life is the joy of being what you are; the misery of life is the misery of being what you are.

"Don't be mean; if you are you will be punished and your meanness will be your punishment. Be noble and you will be rewarded and your nobleness will be your reward.

"These things come about without any regard to priests and persons. Vain is the idea that by believing certain propositions about a murder that was committed at the beginning of our era we can cheat the laws of the universe.

"It is a dangerous delusion. We cannot juggle with the laws of God. We cannot escape the penalty or the reward of our acts.

"Live grandly and you are in heaven; live meanly and you are in hell. We do not go to heaven or to hell, but according to the character of our living, heaven or hell comes to us.

"Life is like a game of whist. We cannot determine what cards shall be given to us, but we can take the cards that are dealt out to us and play them as well as we can.

"And therein lies the whole thing. The man who lives his life well, who lives for truth and principle and the good that he can do for his fellows, is in heaven; while the man who lives carelessly, selfishly, carnally, is in hell.

"In a word, the man who lives as a man reaps the man's reward, and that reward is heaven. The man who lives the life of the brute gets the brute's reward, and that reward is hell."

Dr. Pulsford's closing appeal to his hearers to live like men was one of the most eloquent efforts I ever listened to; and one of the brightest congregations in Chicago went home convinced that it was their finest privilege as well as their highest duty to heed the preacher's words.

Dr. Pulsford came to the Church of the Messiah in March, 1901, from Waltham, Mass., and his extraordinary versatility, unflagging freshness of thought and statement, and most happy combination of intellect and erudition, true goodness and everyday common sense have put new life into the church and paved the way for a new era of all-around prosperity and usefulness—Rev. Thos. B. Gregory in Chicago American.

THE SPIRIT OF THE TREE.

I sat beside a giant tree,
Its gentle shade was over me,

Its bending branches seemed to say,
"We'll shelter you from heat to-day."

And thus I grew to love the tree,
So tender was its care of me.

Its shadows soothed me with caress,
And touched my heart with happiness.

Its dancing leaves were full of glee,
And told their secrets unto me;

The love tales of the singing birds,
The merry gossip without words,

Abont the winds that come and go,
And bring along the news they know;

From over land, and over sea,
To tell unto this kingly tree—

And forth again, the winds all bear,
The tree's own message, sweet and fair,

To kindred trees in far-off lands,
To those who dwell in forest bands.

All this, the spirit of the tree,
Confided quietly to me.

The tree and I are friends to-day—
We'll never in our lives betray

The faithful pledge that we have made,
And signed within its circling shade.

The spirit of the tree is true,
And trusted friends like it are few.

Onset Camp.

Once more we send greeting to the friends of The Progressive Thinker, and wish all could be here to listen to the grand teachings that it has been our privilege to hear. The lectures by the two veteran workers of our glorious cause, Mrs. Sarah A. Byrnes and Mr. J. Frank Baxter, were grand, and they are both a great credit to our cause. Our conferences are of the best, and the lecture by Mr. Thomas Cross, of Fall River, should have been heard by all Spiritualists. Saturday will be Massachusetts State Day, and many speakers will be heard upon this occasion. The Bridgewater Band gives great satisfaction, both at the dances and at the three popular concerts on Sundays.

We are having cool weather, and we are all praying to have it a little warmer. The electric cars come in crowded every trip, and this makes things pretty lively. Many people are here from all over the State, but the question is being asked if Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Locke, of Philadelphia, are to be here this season. Miss Christine Brown is doing a good work with her healing through the power of music. Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader has just arrived upon a flying visit.

The gardens of Onset are looking beautiful; that is the beauty of this place. We have the seashore and the country combined. HATCH.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

THE OCCULT IN DREAMS.

Genius Often Led by Dream Effects.

Dream and even "dope" elements in the world of letters in times past have been accorded high places. Science has been indebted to them in less degree. And in nearly every range of accomplishment by man his work has been influenced by eccentricities almost too ridiculous to be detailed in their absurdities.

Recently the literary world was disposed to laugh when a fiction writer turned out a book based on a dream. However, there is historic basis in the assertion that Coleridge's great poem of "Kubla Khan" was composed in an opium dream. Voltaire is said to have conceived his epic, "La Henreade," while asleep, and Sir Isaac Newton is known to have reached important scientific results in his dreams, and upon awakening demonstrated them to his own satisfaction. Goethe composed many of his poems while on the borderland of somnambulism.

ECCENTRICITIES OF GENIUS.

Other eccentric acts and qualities of literary men are matters of common observation. Frederick the Great so much regretted the loss of a favorite coat that he wore only three times in the course of his life. Napoleon would have nothing to do with steam. Rossini, the composer, hated railway trains. Once, when at the wish of a friend, he rode in one to accustom himself to them, he suddenly fainted, and after recovering declared that if he were not like that he should never have written "The Barber of Seville."

ENVIRONMENT OF WRITERS.

The whims of men of genius in the fury of composition are strange and often laughable. One of the commonest of these is that of being able to write only in a particular costume. Milton, when he was writing "Paradise Lost," wrapped himself up in an old woolen cloak. During many years Balzac did his work enveloped in monkish cowl and gown. Sardou, the author of "Mme. Sans Gene," "Divorcons," and many other popular plays, never for a moment abandons his black velvet cap. Buffon, the naturalist, was precise; he worked only in the full dress costume of his day, with frilled shirt, silk ruffles, and pendent sword.

Such eccentricities as those just mentioned do not serve to quicken a writer's genius. Once they have been adopted they continue to be followed merely because they have become inveterate. But there are other odd habits which seem actually to aid the literary workman. Psychologists explain that these practices stimulate the activity of the brain by increasing the local flow of blood.

HUGO WROTE STANDING.

Victor Hugo, when in the fever of inspiration, walked about his study, muttering like a lunatic. He wrote standing, and cast the finished pages on the floor. Schiller, oddly enough, could write only when his feet were incased in ice. Lord Chatham wrote his speeches between deep drafts of porter. Rossini composed his operas in bed. Shelley, when he thought deeply, lay on the hearth rug with his head close to the fire. Jean Jacques Rousseau, the author of the famous "Confessions," meditated in the open fields under the full glare of the sun. In order to be quite abstracted from the world he would, according to a recent writer in the French Revue Universelle, stuff his ears with wadding, or hide his head in a haystack! J Fenimore Cooper, when writing, filled his mouth with honey lozenges or little balls of licorice. Byron would write only when he sniffed the odor of truffles, with which he stuffed his pockets. Many authors require that their study tables shall be adorned with sweet smelling flowers.

Balzac toned only by the light of many candles; and Zola, when he works of a Sunday, does the same. Another Frenchman, Verlaine, the decadent poet, was most highly inspired amid the din and chatter of Parisian cafes. Darwin, before setting himself to work, would scrape at an old violin.

Tennyson and Flaubert could not endure noise, and Carlyle, to escape the din of the streets and bells, would lock himself in a hermetically sealed room. Baudelaire, maddest of geniuses, had a more than abnormally delicate sense of smell; he always had perfumes about him when he labored, and he could not live in Belgium "because the trees had no fragrance."

LOVE MADNESS IN EARLY YOUTH

Dante fell in love at 9 years, Byron at 8. The latter, on hearing at 16 that his beloved was about to marry, almost fell into convulsions; and, he actually did fall into convulsions when he saw Kean act. Sir Humphrey Davey, on making a discovery, would dance about in his slippers.

Schopenhauer, the philosopher, became furious whenever anyone spelled his name with a double "p," and refused to pay debts that he owed to such persons.

Many men of genius have been almost incapable of expressing themselves in public. Addison never spoke in the presence of strangers. Virgil was stupid in conversation and seemed a quite ordinary person. Dryden said of himself: "My conversation is slow and dull. I am none of those who endeavor to break jests in company or make repartees."

FORGETFULNESS OF THE GREAT.

One of the commonest faults of genius is forgetfulness. Newton, when he left his room to seek for anything, usually returned without it. It is said that he once rammed his niece's finger into his pipe. Mozart often inadvertently cut his fingers when carving meat. Beethoven often went out hatless, or left his coat on the grass when returning from a stroll in the woods. Once, when discovered by officers at Neustadt in such a condition, he was arrested as a vagabond, and as no one credited his repeated assertions that he was Beethoven he would have remained in prison there had not the director of a local orchestra arrived to release him. It is related of Ampere, the great electrician and mechanician, that, having written some mathematical formula on the back of a cab he started in pursuit as soon as the cab moved away.

Another frequent characteristic is a spirit of melancholy. Goethe said that in all his life he had not spent more than four pleasant weeks. The melancholy of Chatterton, the boy poet, led to his untimely suicide. Burns wrote: "My constitution was blasted with a deep, incurable taint of melancholia." George Sand at times wanted to kill herself. Moliere often had fits of depression. Voltaire was a confirmed hypochondriac, and always believed himself about to die. Abraham Lincoln, too, suffered from a melancholy which early in life had on one or two occasions assumed a dangerous form. Chopin would weep at the sight of a crumpled petal or a dead fly.

Still another common trait is intense egotism. Hegel, the philosopher, began a lecture with the words: "I say with Christ, that not only do I teach the truth but that I am myself truth." Balzac, according to his friend, George Sand, always talked well of himself, but of nothing else. "One evening," she says, "having on a beautiful new dressing gown, he wished to go out thus clothed, with a lamp in his hand, to excite the admiration of the public." Chopin directed in his will that he should be buried in a white tie, small shoes, and short breeches.

QUEER TRICKS OF DR. JOHNSON.

Dr. Johnson, walking along the streets of London, made it a point to touch every post he passed; if he missed one he would return to it. Napoleon, when passing down a street, would add up the number of rows of windows. Carlyle was crushed by the idea of ordering coats or buying gloves. It was a torture to him to pack his portmanteau.

Many men of genius are abnormally sensitive to changes of the weather. Napoleon suffered from the slightest wind, and would have fires even in July. Voltaire had his study warmed throughout the year. Byron said he feared cold as much as a gazelle. Milton confessed that in winter the well of his inspiration ran dry.

And so the list of eccentricities might be indefinitely extended. It seems that we have only to know the life of a man of genius to discover that he was marked out from his fellow beings, not only by his greatness, but by his follies and frailties as well.—Chicago Tribune.

Tent Meeting Inaugurated by Miss Sarah Thomas.

The Christian Spiritual Society under the direction of Miss Sarah Thomas, is holding its second annual tent meeting in Reiger's Grove, near the Desplaines river, on Madison street.

The meetings are very interesting, and have been very well attended considering the exceptionally trying weather we have had this season.

A special feature of the meetings this year is the Spirit Conference, held every Friday afternoon and evening.

This conference is for the purpose of bringing out new speakers and workers for the cause of Spiritualism. It also gives those interested and just beginning to investigate a chance to ask questions on any subject or line of thought that puzzles them.

Miss Thomas has been noted for years for her vim and energy in bringing out new mediums and workers in the field, and many of our best mediums to-day, both in Chicago and other cities, have her to thank for bringing them before the public. There are thousands of people who are not mediums, that also have this earnest little Christian Spiritualist to thank for bringing the light of truth to their hearts, and opening their eyes to the beauties of the life beyond the grave, where the real life for eternity begins.

We hope that all who are earnest in this work will give these meetings all the support and encouragement that they deserve.

We cordially invite all true Spiritualists, whether mediums or not, to come out to the tent and join with us in trying to spread the truth of Spiritualism to those who are earnestly seeking the light.

The camp is very beautifully situated in a grove of large shade trees, and is a lovely spot to spend a day with your children and friends. It is also convenient to the Madison street cars, about 40 minutes ride from State street. The grove is opposite Concordia cemetery, and between Gale and Thatcher avenues.

All who know or have ever heard Miss Thomas can testify to the truth of the wonderful communications that she gives through spirit power, and we ask all who have received such communications to bring at least one friend, if not more, to receive the blessed assurance that we can communicate with our loved ones that are gone into spirit life.

In doing even this much you will aid in spreading a good truth, and bringing joy to many poor souls who are now groping in the dark.

We welcome all, regardless of church denominations—regardless of positions in life, whether rich or poor, high or low, black or white. We ask all to come and receive the gospel of Jesus, and the demonstration of spirit communication.

Spirits of the Living.

In The Progressive Thinker of July 19, was an article from John F. Jordan, of Carondelet, Mo., asking for information on the subject of spirit control by Red Cloud, and Red Cloud is yet living in his physical body. Red Cloud's answer was appropriate when he said, "Where is the young chief, or pale face, when he is asleep?"

Spiritualism has come to answer many perplexing questions. I have left my body asleep and appeared to clairvoyants at a circle, and controlled a medium to write messages to a friend of mine at the circle, when my body was asleep at home in Michigan, and the circle in San Francisco, Cal., and have visited my friends in the spirit world, and walked with them in their flower gardens, and the ground was as tangible to my spiritual feet as the earth is to my physical feet. Spiritualism has come to unfold our spiritual individuality, and prove to each one through his own spiritual unfoldment his own immortality.

INTEMPERANCE.

Lift Up Your Voice in a Just Cause.

Did you ever think how easy it is to form a bad habit? If you have observed the workings of your own thoughts, and the actions of others, you will believe my theory that it is easier to form a bad habit than a good habit. Man is like an animal in his passions and desires, and like a god in his spiritual aspirations. Man has the choice to be evil or pure. It is often said that evil habits are inherited. What if they are? The more formidable the foe which is vanquished, the greater is the victory. Man has moral force, and he can resist evil. If a person is addicted to vice, should he be excused because his father and mother were evil? Decidedly not. It is a weak excuse. A man can rule his body; his passions and desires, by right thinking.

The mind of man is very susceptible to glittering show, evil passions and vices. The seductive saloon, with its glittering mirror, its gilded chandeliers, the musical tinkling of stringed instruments, clinking of glasses and careless laughter, its vile pictures, are all magnets to draw men on to their dire ruin. They are drawn by the glitter, as the bird circles to the ground with its gaze fastened on the serpent's sparkling eye.

It is hard sometimes for the degenerate to avoid the temptations of the evil thoughts which lurk in the hidden closets of the mind. We should help the struggling, sinking men and women who are addicted to drink. How can we do it? By lifting our voice for the abolishment of the liquor saloon, licensed or unlicensed. We should send health thoughts to the struggling ones. We should invoke the aid of the arisen ones. We should pray that the erring one may be impressed by a vision; by the caress of an angel mother. Such things have happened, and they will happen again. But let us not depend wholly on outside help, let us help by our own efforts. Let us do a service for the coming generation. Let us make the battle between vice and virtue easier for the unborn child. Is it any wonder that the child is tainted with a thirst for stimulants, when his parents are addicted to drink?

Think what a crime it is to be a party to the creating of a child, if you are a debauched person. Imagine it, the child tainted in the cradle, at the very beginning of life. Oh, evil of intemperance! O, demon who makes beasts of men, who makes orphans and murderers! Oh, hideous snake, despoiler of homes, corrupter of morals! Oh, burning alcohol, which for a time raises the drinker unto heights of delirious pleasure, only to shortly tumble him into the lowest pits of agony and despair!

In the flash of the diamond ring which adorns the rumseller's hand, I see the death-lustre of the drunkard's eye, as he gasps out his life in some filthy hovel. In the flash of the fashionable clothes worn by the arch fiend who sells intoxicating drink I see commingling drops of the drunkard's blood. Every click of his horses hoofs on the pavement hits with stunning, terrible force, the heart of some starving woman or child.

If we have no money, we can yet aid the temperance cause. We have free speech. Think of it; free speech. We also have our thoughts. The power of thought is boundless. If you know a person who is addicted to drink, you can help him by sending a pure thought.

Sit in the silence of evening, and call up in your mind the face of the person you wish to treat. Or better, use a photograph. After excluding all other thoughts from your mind; think intently of the person. Argue in your mind with the person you have pictured in thought. Say: "You should stop drinking liquor; you should have more ambition to do right. You know it is wrong to become intoxicated. You should not do it. If you stop drinking, you will gain in health and strength, and you will be a great deal more happy."

Talk to the thought image, by your thoughts. Picture with thought the good coming from a sober, industrious life. Think your thoughts to the thought image; as you would talk to the person with your voice. Affirm over and over, that the drinking of liquor must stop; that it will stop. According to your perseverance and magnetic power will you succeed.

Think good of a person and you will benefit yourself at the same time. If you should descend so low as to think evil of another; you will reap the benefit of the evil thought on your own body. Be careful what you sow.

GOD'S LEAFY BOWERS.

God's leafy bowers, dew-lighted with showers,
Where a solemn splendor reigns,
The world enslaved to its moss-banks paved,
Finds rest from its weary pains.
The pomp and rule of church and school,
No longer tether and bind,
As the summer invites, freed from mockish rites,
The weary soul and mind.

God's leafy bowers, sweet scented with flowers,
As halcyon as June and May,
God weaves a spell, as his lessons tell,
And his mandates we obey.
Away from strife of a city life,
'Neath a canopy of green,
The tired heart seeks God apart,
Where no shadow lies between.

God's leafy bowers, where the silent hours
Are fraught with mystic ties,
Where the roof and floor heaven's sunshine pour,
With a light from angel eyes.
A vision replete, sacred and sweet,
In the house not made with hands,
Where worshipful minds, in its sacredness find
God is mightier than worlds or lands.

BISHOP A. BEALS.

In the World Celestial.

Mrs. Mary T. Longley, secretary of the N. S. A., and one of the best and most famous mediums in the world, writes that she has read with much real pleasure Dr. Bland's book, "In the World Celestial," and that the descriptions of the spirit world given in it are in substantial accord with those given by Father John Pierpont and other exalted spirits through her mediumship. She pronounces the book interesting, instructive and helpful; its philosophy good, its descriptions excellent and its trend of spiritual thought uplifting. In closing her gracious endorsement of the work, she says: "That spirits still in the flesh) can leave the mortal and travel to the spheres, I well know; and that they can bring back memories of their experiences for the instruction of their fellow mortals, I am assured. I hope the book may have a large sale. The introduction by Rev. Dr. Thomas is alone worth the price of the work." Price $1. For sale at this office.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE. AUSTRALIA.

A SHIVERING PAUPER.

And therefore I say that Spiritualism is the only thing which can save not merely the churches but society from moral and spiritual bankruptcy; and possibly from dissolution and despair. For just contemplate what will follow the recognition by religionists of a power which will substitute convincing knowledge for impotent belief. The priesthood of the future will be composed of highly educated, scientifically prepared, and carefully developed mediums, trained, as their predecessors among the Hebrews were—in colleges which will resemble the ancient School of the Prophets. Now imagine such a preacher ascending the pulpit of a cathedral at the close of a musical service, expressly arranged to harmonize the conditions and to bring the minds of the congregation into a state of passive receptivity. He is surrounded by controls of an elevated character, and he is impressed to select, as the text of his inspirational discourse, the words, "Verily I say unto you—'A rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven.'" Well, his guides and guardians throw him into a trance, and they permit him to be taken possession of by the spirit of a man who was in affluent circumstances on the earth, and formerly occupied a prominent seat in that very cathedral; but is now a shivering pauper in the lowest sphere of the other world. He has longed, like Dives, to return to the earth so that he might warn his brethren, "lest they also come into this place of torment;" but, more fortunate than Dives, he has been allowed to do so. If you have read—as I hope every one here present has done so—the "Christmas Carol" of Charles Dickens, which he has assured me was written under powerful spirit direction, you can easily imagine the nature of the discourse which would be delivered from the pulpit of that cathedral by the unhappy spirit of the rich man.

A REMARKABLE APPEARANCE.

Let us recall, however, what passed between the ghost of Jacob Marley and his old partner, Ebenezer Scrooge, on that memorable Christmas Eve; when the former appeared before him with a chain wound around his body, to which was attached a heavy appendage composed of cash-boxes, keys, padlocks, ledgers, deeds and ponderous purses wrought in steel. Scrooge asked him why he walked the earth, and Marley replied:

"It is required of every man that the spirit within him should walk abroad, among his fellow men, and travel far and wide; and if that spirit goes not forth in life, it is condemned to do so after death. It is doomed to wander through the world—oh! woe is me!—and witness what it cannot share, but might have shared on earth, and turned to happiness."

"You are fettered," exclaimed Scrooge, "tell me why."

"I wear the chain I forged in life," the Ghost replied. "I made it link by link, and yard by yard; I girded it on of my own free will, and of my own free will I wore it. Is its pattern strange to you?"

Scrooge, in awe and fear, asks the spirit to speak comfort to him.

"I have none to give," is the reply. "It comes from other regions, and is conveyed by other ministers to other kinds of men. * * I cannot rest, I cannot stay, I cannot linger anywhere. My spirit never walked beyond our counting house—mark me!—in life my spirit never roamed beyond the limits of our money-changing hole; and weary journeys lie before me!"

"Seven years dead," mused Scrooge, "and traveling all the time?"

"The whole time," said the Ghost. "No rest, no peace. In constant torture of remorse."

Scrooge interjected a jocular remark, and the spirit reprovingly rejoined:

"Oh! captive, bound, and double ironed! Not to know, that ages of incessant labor by immortal creatures are required, for this earth must pass into eternity before the good of which it is susceptible is all developed;—not to know that any Christian spirit working kindly in its little sphere, whatever it may be, will find its mortal life too short for its vast means of usefulness;—not to know that no space of regret can make amends for one life's opportunities missed! Yet such was I! Such was I!"

"But you were always a good man of business," faltered Scrooge.

"Business!" cried the Ghost, wringing its hands "Mankind was my business. The common welfare was my business, charity, forbearance and benevolence, were all my business. The dealings of my trade were but a drop of water in the comprehensive ocean of my business!"

Now, imagine the spirit of a Melbourne Marley, speaking through the lips of a gifted medium from the pulpit of St. Paul's or St. Patrick's Cathedral. He may have been a strictly religious, and an undeniably moral man, who went to church twice every Sunday, had family prayers morning and evening, and was looked up to as a model citizen, and quoted as a signal example of a successful man of business both in the Chamber of Commerce and on the Stock Exchange.

But, for all that, the aim and end of his life, was the accumulation of wealth; and when he crossed the boundary line which separates this world of shadows from the realm of realities, he discovered that his earthly life had been a dismal failure; that instead of living for others, he had lived for himself; and that for years and years to come his efforts must be continuously directed to undo the past; to retrieve the errors of an entire existence; and to strive, amidst incessant difficulties and disappointments, to influence for good human beings who were still in the flesh, but who refused to be impressed by him, just as he had shown himself to be unamenable to the impressions of his own guardian angels.

And this had become one of his heaviest punishments—to meet with rebuffs in every direction; and to move about among his fellow men, and in his old home, passionately longing to do good and to restrain those who were still near and dear to him, from repeating his own faults and follies, and from following his own untoward example; and yet to find them all so unresponsive to his spiritual influence.

Talk of Hell!

There is no Hell like the unavailing remorse of such an one.

He speaks in accents of entreaty, remonstrance, pathetic pleading and earnest supplication, but his spiritual voice is inaudible to mortal ears.

He looks with eyes that are blinded by tears, into the eyes of those whom he has left behind him, but there is no token of recognition from theirs.

He touches them with his spiritual hands, and there is no consciousness on their part, of any such contact.

He sees his sons becoming as sordid as himself; and he remembers, with a spasm of anguish, that he taught them to be so.

He sees his daughters leading a life of frivolous self indulgence and chiefly intent upon the pursuit of a phantom which they call pleasure; and he reflects that it was he who provided them with the means of thus frittering away an existence which might have been turned to such noble and beneficent uses.

He perceives with frightful clearness the opportunities which he neglected, and the duties which he left unfulfilled and there probably recurs to his memory, with painful vividness, the mournful lament of the Quaker poet:

"Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these: 'It might have been.'"

Imagine, let me beg of you, the spirit of such a man as Marley bewailing the errors of his earthly life, and describing the intolerable remorse and unspeakable mental suffering which these have entailed upon him in the other world, in the presence of a thousand people, to numbers of whom he was perfectly well known, and to whom his voice and manner and the very incidents of his narrative, combine to demonstrate his identity beyond all doubt; and then picture to yourselves the effect of such a confession and of such a revelation upon the minds of all who listen to it! Would the most eloquent sermon ever preached by the greatest of clerical mediums—and there have been many such—reach the hearts of a congregation as this voice from beyond the grave would do? How many of his hearers would dare to go on "laying up treasure on earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and thieves break through and steal," after listening to such a spirit's remorseful wail over his own wasted life?

At present numbers of externally devout men, who sit under this or that popular preacher, will hear him expound the words of the parable which speaks of a certain rich man whose ground brought forth plentifully; and who said to himself, "This will I do. I will pull down my barns and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods; and I will say to my soul, 'Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry.' But God said unto him, Thou fool! this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall these things be, which thou hast provided?"

Our good church-goer listens to the parable, nods his head approvingly, and whispers to himself: "Very good, indeed, as applied to the people of Palestine, but quite obsolete in relation to the men and women of our more enlightened times." And so he goes home to his midday meal, with a feeling of thankfulness in his heart that his own good fortune has placed him in a totally different state of society in which money making has been reduced to a science.

BROTHER BARKER'S CREED.

Well, since you ask me, parson, I'll just tell you where I stand
On this universal savin' plan you preach;
It is very philanthropic, an' it does sound mighty grand,
But it isn't what my mind an' conscience teach.
I've left many years behind me, an'
sometimes as I look back
There are many queerish things that catch my eye;
I have tried to keep my footsteps in the straight an' narrow track,
An' of theories like yours I still fight shy.

We hang a man for murder, but there's many crimes that's worse
Which the laws of mankind utterly ignore;
An' you'll have to show me, parson,
how you're goin' to lift the curse
An' land all these people on the heavenly shore.
"Repent," you say. Well, that's all right, but doesn't fill the bill—
Doesn't lessen all the misery an' woe
Which some folks cause upon this earth, an' which will linger till Long years after they are called upon to go.

Now you just tell me, parson, what the drunkard's goin' to do
When he's called to stand before the great white throne;
What of all the years of misery his family passed through,
An, the want, abuse, neglect that they have known?
Does the fact that he "repented" when he drew his latest breath
Land him with fair an' shinin' cherubim,
While they remain an' struggle through a fearful livin' death
Because of woes entailed on them by him?

What about the brawling woman who has passed her time on earth
Making everything unpleasant in her home;
Scolding, finding fault, repressing every sign of joy or mirth—
Tell me, what will be the shrewish
marplot's doom?
There's a problem for you, parson.
Can the leopard change his spots,
Or the dusky Ethiopian his skin?
Was an angel e'er considered in the great Jehovah's thoughts
Who possessed this very meanest kind of sin?

There are many I could mention—there is quite a varied list—
To be measured by your scale of piety;
The seducer an' the usurer, an' others who exist
On the price of some one else's misery,
When I see these creatures, parson, slaves of lust an' greed an' drink,
An' without a particle of Christ-like leaven,
I cannot accept your doctrine, an' I'm simply forced to think
That some people are not wanted up in heaven.

God is merciful and loving, but above all, He is just,
An' He's given me a rule to guide my life—
One that covers the beatitudes of love
an' faith an' trust,
An avoids the shoals of bickering an'
strife.
It is this: "Do unto others as you'd have them do to you;"
An' with this in mind I've never felt the need
Of hatchin' schemes for savin' folks, no matter what they do,
Or of fixin up a doctrine or a creed.

The New Christianity.

The trend of modern thought and the effect of modern methods of Bible study and criticism, are discernible in the attitude of the more advanced and independent class of thinkers among ministers and religious teachers.

The old regime that held to a Bible of which every word was verbally inspired and infallible truth, though still represented by moss-covered biblicists of the most non-progressive type, is still in evidence whenever some progressive thinker takes a step forward.

But the modern man finds that the "higher criticism," as it is called, is but the application to the Bible of that method of study which is universal in the investigation of other historical documents. For this reason the methods and results of the higher criticism commend themselves by their reasonableness.

The higher criticism, however, in thus treating the Bible the same as any human document, takes the underpinning away from Christianity as it has long been understood.

In fact, it will be seen that by thus tacitly taking away from the Bible its absolute authority, not only is belief in the historical character of certain stated occurrences greatly modified, but the foundation for every religious belief, based on the Bible, is overthrown.

For instance, God is made to appear less personal, or rather as an impersonal, motive power of the universe. Thus the higher criticism, installing the new Christianity, does away with a personal God.

By the same process Christ is made merely a good man, divine only in the sense that all good men are divine.

Continuing the process of elimination yet further by the same method, the definite belief in immortality is lost.

Thus, one after the other, the cardinal doctrines and beliefs of the old Christianity are set aside by the higher criticism, and yet the higher critics believe in the Bible and Christianity. But under their higher criticism it is virtually a new Bible and a new Christianity to which they hold.

Having gone thus far in their quest for truth, and having discarded the old notions that have been so long paraded as constituting vital Christian faith, it would seem proper that the higher critics should advance just a step farther, and regain their lost belief in immortality—or rather, become possessed of the knowledge that is brought by the demonstrations of spirit continuity of life, through the manifestations of the phenomena of Spiritualism.

Beauty in Truth.

A fine study in sociology as related to truth and beauty, esthetically considered, is presented by "Bliss Carman" in the Evening Post of this city.

In his estimation, it would seem that of all the brave soldiers in the cause of truth the social reformer is most to be honored. For the field of his toil is the hardest and least lovely of all. The investigator of the natural sciences and the the speculator in philosophy have great and exceeding rewards for their labor, compensations and joys by the way, for at every turn of the road the springs of truth are welling eternally for their refreshment and delight. They are heartened by a sense of coming ever more nearly into accord with nature, and an appreciation of the beauty which resides in law is their daily keeper. They are bent, you may say, on the study of beauty itself, since beauty is only another phase of orderly truth.

The student of social science, however, has for his subject not the natural operation of cosmic laws leading to beautiful results, but the eternally pestiferous operations of evil. His energies are bent on diagnosing a disease. That the social system as it stands is a malignant human malady I suppose no thoughtful person will deny. We all of us feel its abnormal effects. Its incongruities meet us on every hand, at every moment. We live in a time which has so far perfected mechanism and invented machinery that it can multiply wealth at will. Yet we abide in the midst of a hideousness so discouraging that our instincts unconsciously revolt at it.

Why is it that we all rush to the country as soon as the weather is warm enough? What is the reason of this apparent reverting to Nature? Is Nature more interesting than man? Can we really find more solace and enjoyment among trees and rocks than among our fellow beings? Certainly not The simple truth is that we have made modern life—our cities, our houses, our clothes, all our industrial arts, all the work of our hands—so unspeakably ugly that we cannot live with them ourselves. We rush to Nature in despair, because it is only in Nature that there is any beauty remaining.

In man's character the capacity for beauty is just as great and strong as the capacity for truth and the capacity for goodness. Man's power to tell right from wrong and his power to know truth from falsehood are no more inherent faculties in his nature than the power to discriminate between beauty and ugliness. It's our misfortune to have forgotten this. Yet it remains true (or so it seems to me, at least) that our capacity for enjoying beauty is just as legitimate and ennobling a function of man as our capacity for finding pleasure in the good and the true. These three faculties or aptitudes are the three ties which link us to the divine, as we call it. They prove our title to a kinship with perfection, and their operation affords us the surest happiness.

What Kind of an Angel Does Such a Person Make?

The Chicago Chronicle has been scintillating with an account of a remarkable dinner given by Mrs. Potter Palmer—a Chicago lady. It appears from the account given that each plate at this wonderful festival—outdoing anything of the kind in Pagan times—cost $1,500. Most of her guests on that occasion, one would think, would have preferred the money, but she would have had some trouble in dividing up, as her caterer would have asked almost as much had there been but one dinner.

Mrs. Palmer is noted the world over for the lavish way in which she entertains, yet it is by no means certain that her dinners are much better than other people's. They cost more, the decorations are composed of rarer flowers and the number of guests is usually larger, but one cannot have any better than the best, and there's no use getting jealous, anyway.

Last January she paid $12,000 for the dinner with which she celebrated the birth of the New Year. Her entire house was turned over to the caterer, who had orders to do the best he could and spare no expense to make the evening unique. Special high-priced dinner ware was routed out, packed carefully and transferred to her palatial residence, wines of ancient vintage and delicate aroma were secured, the most artistic chefs in the land were engaged for one night only and a whole corps of imported highly trained waiters were pressed into service for a consideration. Still all these items combined counted for little at the eventual reckoning. Mrs. Palmer paid more for her flowers than for viands and liquors, service and cooking combined.

The feature of the table decorations on that occasion were American beauty roses at $1 each and sprays of lilies of the valley raised in hothouses to grace a millionaire's table. So, perhaps, it is not correct after all to say her dinner cost $1,500 a plate. The dinner did not, but the dinner plus the decorations of house and table did.

But Mrs. Potter Palmer, world-famed as she is, is not the only Chicago society leader to pour out money on an evening's entertainment. The famous Sprague-Warner wedding feast of a few years back cost every cent of $25,000.

In the above we have a comprehensive illustration of what is going on among the so-called higher class of wealthy aristocrats in this country. That this lavish display of wealth and luxury had a modicum of good connected with it, no one will for a moment doubt. The florist was well paid for his labor; the waiters reaped a rich harvest; the cook came in for his share of the benefits, and the common laborer, too, reaped something from the crumbs that fell from the wealthy lady's table. She lavishly and ostentatiously entertained those who were already surfeited with the rare viands that only the ingenious cook can render palatable. Being used to luxury, extravagance and everything else that distinguishes the millionaire, we can conclude that the $1,500 plate furnished by Mrs. Palmer did not to any great extent increase the vibrations of their happiness.

Mrs. Palmer is not only wealthy, but she is a lady of refinement and culture, well known by reputation in this country and Europe. Under the government she has occupied several important positions, and in many respects is a model American woman.

But suppose an angel from heaven, imbued, as you may think, with all that is exalted, holy and good, and whose very presence would be God-like, should come to earth, and stopping in New York, arrange for a feast, each plate to cost $2,000, and inviting thereto the wealthy nabobs of the great metropolis—what would you think of such an angel?

Would you admire him?

Would you praise his tact, his good sense, and his "divine" mission to earth?

No, you would call him a miserable donkey, a miscreant from the City Celestial, and not as near to God as the imaginary Orthodox Devil.

If you sought to rest your eyes upon him, it would be because you regarded him as a monstrosity, a renegade from the courts of heaven, and unworthy of any countenance or respect among a truly civilized people. In fact you would call him a bastard or counterfeit angel.

While measuring such an angel accurately, what say you of earthy mortals who will spend thousands of dollars on a single plate, when the widow's poverty-stricken moan and the orphan's cry of distress can be heard in nearly every square mile in the United States?

If the angel of heaven who came to earth and instituted a feast as above described, should be weighed and condemned, what of those mortals who pattern after him? It is for you, reader, to judge of their exact status.

In our opinion, those persons who have $1,500 to spend at a feast on each plate, and devotes it exclusively to that purpose, can pass though the eye of a needle easier than they gain a high position in heaven. They are false to all the grand and noble instincts of human nature.

Instead of making poor souls glad with their wealth, they squander it, dissipate it, throw it away on a feast.

Verily can such a person take an advanced position in spirit life when death finally comes?

We think not.

Why not?

Because they make a misuse of their power to do good.

If you have wealth, you should only consider yourself its custodian with which to do good, and nothing else.

To divert it in the wrong channel—merely to satisfy one's taste for gaudy display—is actually a sin—an outrage against the human family in the aggregate.

From our inmost soul we pity the selfishly wealthy. The honest, industrious peasant, pinched with poverty, stands nearer the angel world than the $1,500-a-plate magnates do.

UNCONSCIOUS INFLUENCES.

Their Potent Power for Good or Evil.

For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself.—Romans 14-7.

Somebody has said that thoughts are things. The phrase is unfortunate, because it is misleading and inaccurate. This world is made up of things and forces. Thoughts are more subtle than mere things and far more potential. They are forces which change a man's life for better or for worse.

If you apply the principles of wireless telegraphy to spiritual concerns you will see the full scope of my statement. We may safely do this, for there is a spiritual law running parallel to every physical law, and no man can discover a physical law without suggesting a corresponding spiritual law. In this way all thinkers stand shoulder to shoulder, lifting the world out of the old into the new.

The wireless telegrapher tells us that a word or its equivalent creates a vibration of the air, as a pebble creates a ripple in the pond, and this vibration speeds on its way to the destined terminus, however distant, and there makes itself known and felt. We are living in an age of miracles, or, in other words, an age of discovery, and this is one of the startling results.

In like manner a word of scorn or of praise hurled into the spiritual universe from a heart that loves or hates becomes a living force, not lost in the general confusion as a single note is lost in the multitude of sounds, but going straight to the man or woman against whom or in favor of whom it is directed. That other heart at the further end of the line, perhaps half broken by remorse or timidity hoping for better days, is the receiving station of this wireless telegraphy. Your thought, critical or gentle, strikes that other heart with an impact which either hurts or helps. You may not know that your thought has taken its flight, that other person may not know whence it comes, but all the same he is uplifted or depressed by it.

This may seem strange and even incredible, but while it is to-day a possible fact, it may to-morrow become a demonstrated truth, and the next day it may change the whole outlook of the spiritual world. It has the appearance of a miracle, but profounder knowledge always seems miraculous, while in reality we only climb from the lower to the higher realm of law, see further and understand God better.

A spoken thought is even now recognized as a force when speaker and hearer are within earshot of each other. An oath, a compliment, a bit of vocal flattery go through the ear to the heart and kindle a flame of resentment or of happiness. What you say becomes part of another man's life and excites passion or stimulates friendship. Why may there not be a quicker transit than the slow and dull ear affords? Why may not the time come when we can convey our thoughts without the coarse medium of words? There are no words between us and heaven. A prayer is a longing of the soul, "uttered or unexpressed." The impression is instantaneous, as when the sun makes its mark on the photographer's plate.

There are "unseen beings who walk the earth both when we wake and when we sleep," but they use no words. They make us feel their presence, and we are as sure that they are close by as though we heard a trumpet call. What they would say steals into the heart, for our poor ears cannot catch it. We hear nothing, but we know that they are giving us a helping hand. Is there any language in heaven except that of thoughts?

When the world grows older why may we not speak to each other without this cumbersome factor of spoken words? Progress is indefinite and infinite, and we are moving in that direction. We catch glimpses of the possible already. A look, a pressure of the hand, and sympathy or contempt are complete. Enlarge the circumference and you have a new truth. No one needed to tell the Christ what he thought. He read the heart as an open book. He looked at a man and the man's story was already told. Lips had nothing to do with it. The Master felt the woes and shared the joys of humanity. A subtler language than we can use was at his command.

A thought is the wireless message of soul to soul. Your neighbor's welfare is affected by your kind or unkind criticism of him. When we deal with subtle and far reaching forces of this kind, then religion, which enjoins charity, is brought to the forefront as the most important factor in human life. If you would be at your best you must love your neighbor, for your thought of him will either lift him up or trip him to a fall. The whole trend and swing of the universe bid a man be honest, just and gentle, for we are so bound together that nobility in one kindles nobility in all, and one man's hurt is an injury to all. Since we are marching, one great company, from time to eternity, let us go as brothers, with a kindly word and a helping hand whenever opportunity offers.

The above is from the New York Herald, and is a Sunday Sermon by George H. Hepworth, now deceased. Since his death the Herald has published sermons by various ministers. The most of them are insipid twaddle. The place of Mr. Hepworth on the Herald as a Sermonizer cannot be filled from the ranks of the churches.

HOME CIRCLE EXPERIENCE

An Interesting Narrative of Spirit Manifestations.

As I promised in my former letter that I would report again of our progress in our home circle, I shall now take the liberty to do so, though but very little remains to be told. We started to sit regularly again and had our first seance, February 5. Present were Mrs. Wulff, daughter, Mr. Traulson, Alexander, myself and two or three others whose names I forget.

We were informed by one of the spirits speaking through the trumpet that there were about fifty spirits present who were all anxious to speak, and while this spirit was speaking, Eagle Eye, the Indian, came with great noise, as he always does, and brought an immense lot of beautiful flowers. Four spirits of soldiers who had been killed in the Philippine Islands, came and spoke through the trumpet, gave their names, which were recognized, and sent messages to their friends, and at the following seance one of the soldiers came again to our circle and requested us to sing a Decoration Day song, and Mrs. Wulff's little girl sang a song which she had learned at school, and while the little girl was singing the soldier helped her and sang through the trumpet.

After the song he stated there was a flower for the little girl, and on investigating we found the flower inside of the trumpet. The soldier had evidently taken the flower from the table where our Indian friend had left quite a lot of them just before the soldier came to us.

The wife of Mr. Traulson, who passed over some years ago, came and spoke through the trumpet and requested us to give her daughter who was present at the seance, a flower also, and this flower was left inside of the trumpet.

At the next seance the spirit of Mrs. Stuart, who is almost always with us, announced the presence of a colored man, but she stated that he was afraid to make himself known because he had promised to bring us some cotton plants about two weeks previous, and did not bring them. I told him I would excuse him, as I did not think there was any cotton growing just then with snow on the ground, and he seemed to be much pleased and he stated he would get us some cotton seed, which he did, and in less that 30 minutes he returned and left a great big handful of cotton seed alongside of me on the floor, and he did the same at the next seance.

At the next seance only Mrs. Wulff and daughter and myself were present. The Indian came with great noise, and I felt something drop on the floor alongside of me at the cabinet, and on investigating found the Indian had brought us some little trinkets from the tribe, which he had promised about two months previous (but we had forgotten it), in the shape of seven beautiful little shells.

Well we were surprised, and on inquiry the Indian stated he had got them from the tribe. One spirit by the name of Jim McDonald had quite a talk through the trumpet, and I inquired of him how soon we would have materialization which was promised us, and he stated that just as soon as I would give up to them we would have some grand results, but he said I was too stubborn, and wanted to know too much, and they could not get me under control; which is correct, as I am doing all this to study and learn if possible how the forces operate.

At the next seance there were six persons present, and the Indian again brought lots of flowers, which he threw all over me in the cabinet which I occupied at the time, and the flowers were most beautiful, and so fresh that my face was wet from the flowers. Our friend, Mrs. Stuart, spoke through the trumpet and stated that about forty spirits were in the room who desired to speak through the trumpet, and we had quite a conversation with some of them, and some were recognized and some were entire strangers.

During the month of March I was at Salt Lake City, but my friends home had good results just the same.

After my arrival home the spirits again brought many flowers and distributed them amongst those in the circle and there were about eight or nine persons.

At the next seance, which was quite interesting, there were about 6 or 7 of us. Mrs. Stuart spoke through the trumpet for quite awhile, then the Indian tried to speak through the trumpet, but could not be understood and he seemed to get quite angry. We coaxed him to bring flowers and he stated he would bring rose to pale-face brave, which he did, as amongst the flowers there was just one rose. Our colored friend, Sim Bristow, and Aug. Spies, Jim McDonald and Emma Hurst or Hirsh were with us, and all but Bristow talked with us.

At the next two seances we had a medium, Mrs. Bartel, from Cripple Creek, Col., with us, and the results were grand.

At the following seances there were nine persons; three ladies were entire strangers to us, but some of the flowers which the spirits brought seemed to be partly withered, and the speaking through the trumpet was hardly audible as it was just a whisper.

Next seance, ten persons present, but no manifestations to speak of.

The next few seances were about the same as the preceding ones, with the exception of spirit friend, Una Carter, who brings us lots of flowers also, and at times puts flowers in Mrs. Wulff's hair.

About the latter part of June the spirit friends reported that the conditions were not right and they could not bring flowers, and one evening Una Carter was just about to distribute some flowers, when our Indian came and took them from her and ran away with them. This was seen clairvoyantly by Mr. Traulson, from Council Bluffs.

At several seances of late, we received but very little manifestation, and on inquiry were told that our circle was not harmonious any more; but I think that they are working on some other manifestation and will give us a surprise before long. The last two seances were quite interesting, as I had a long talk with my mother and Aug. Spies, also with McDonald, who told us that if I would leave business cares at home they would give us materialization. In fact, I could feel them work with me, and could feel their touch, and a materialized hand could be seen on my shoulder. No doubt we will have better results again after the weather gets cooler and we all feel in better condition physically and mentally. During all these seances I noticed that whenever we were tired and worn out there would be no result.

We had hundreds of minor manifestations during all this time, but I forgot, but I must say that there are lots of people who sat years and never had the result that we had inside of 15 months, and all I can say to investigators is, form home circles, be honest and sincere, and you will be successful.

NORMAL AND ABNORMAL.

A Psychological Study of Relative Advantages.

One can find matter for a rather fine and not unprofitable study, in these days when "The Law of Psychic Phenomena" and the persistent attempts to push it forward into a notoriety and acceptance to which it has no just claim, are matters of some interest—in an article in the Chicago Tribune, which asks the pertinent question:

Are you a normal man—or woman? If you think you are normal, have you ever wished, out of your mediocrity, that you might have been "insane" enough to have been a "genius" instead?

If so, you will be interested in the general expression of Chicago alienists that geniuses and the work of geniuses have cost the world all that they have come to. On the other hand, you may have your choice, as a normal man, of feeling that if all other men in all other times had been normal, the world today would be vastly beyond its present; or you may muse upon the statement that if every person born into the world had been of your degree of normality for a period, the result would have been decadence and death of the type.

"Normality in the individual is only a relative term, depending upon the person's environment," said Dr. J. G. Kiernan. "Normality in the individual in one environment would be abnormality had it developed in another environment. Perfection would imply the disuse of certain functions, and disuse inevitably would produce degeneration."

"With a world population of normal men in all the past of history we would have been immensurably in advance of our present civilization," said Dr. Oscar A. King. "The normal type cannot be confused with mediocrity, and in the world's accomplishments the massed efforts of normal minds, freed from the incubus of the abnormal, would have landed us far ahead of what we are today in civilization."

"In my judgment," said Dr. Daniel R. Brower, "every accomplishment, past or present, that has been of permanent value to humanity and civilization, has come from the normal mind. The term 'normal' may be open to question, but I will say that nobody who has earned the title of 'crank' has left a mark of his crankness upon the world that has been for the general and lasting good."

And yet the world's poetry has been classed pathologically as a produce of hysteria. Some of the world's greatest musicians and composers have been called insane. Some of its greatest painters have worked under the spur of hallucinations.

"It is not to say that Poe did not do some great work," said Dr. Kiernan. "But when he was away on a periodic spree, he was not writing poetry, and no one can say how much better poetry he would have written had he not gone on the spree."

"Sickness of mind never could be looked upon as desirable for the world," said Dr. King. "With a mind sick, however, it might be tempted because of its sickness to efforts in one line, with results beyond the limitations of the normal. But to the extent that a mind or body is sick, the individual becomes a charge upon society, hampering civilization far beyond its accomplishments for society."

"One can build permanently only on the basis of truth and sanity," insists Dr. Brower. "You wouldn't choose a mind out of balance for this? For just to the extent that such a mind is out of balance it will build out of balance."

These are utterances of authorities on ill-balanced brains, and on nerves that are out of harmony and consonance. There are other views on the subject, however. One of the best known physicians in Chicago, who has made a general study of the value of the abnormal brain to civilization, takes issue with the experts.

"I am not an alienist," he said, "therefore I cannot speak by the card. Only as a reader of history and as an observer of men can I give an opinion. That opinion, speaking widely, is that the world of the present is quite as much indebted to the abnormal and deficient ones as it is to its normal types.

"For instance, it is incalculable how much civilization owes to the abnormal ones for its spread in the world. A man who breaks away from the civilization of his time and settles in a Utah desert, making it blossom and bear fruit, is not balanced. But can you question the value of his pioneering to civilization? Men and women who broke away from the vices and follies of Great Britain to found a colony in New England were not judicious. They carried with them the seeds of an even worse social condition. If they had been able to look far enough ahead it is doubtful if they would have braved the hardships that were before them. Yet they founded a great nation.

"How much are the failures of the abnormal ones worth to the level-headed world? In the mere rushing in 'where angels fear to tread,' the negative results of their follies become positive results in many situations. A dozen sane men, conservative, cautious, careful, may have been considering a proposition upon which none cared to move. Then some man, less nicely balanced, steps in, perhaps, with intelligence enough to prove the proposition. At least he demonstrates its impracticability.

Arguing for the necessity of the defective in society, Dr. Kiernan goes so far as to draw upon the poets whom alienists in many instances have relegated to the realms of the neurotic. He says:

"Environment is continually changing and such animals as are settled in a particular niche degenerate. The ease with which existence is secured tends in the direction of degeneracy. The spider which inhabits the human abode, securing its food easily, has lost all spider characteristics except in the egg. Poets who have dreamed of the ideal state where all is settled perfection later have seen a more hopeful view in progress, as in Tennyson's 'Evolutionist:'

"'I have climb'd to the snows of Age, and I gaze at a field in the Past,
Where I sank with the body at time in the sloughs of a low desire,
But I hear no yelp of the beast, and the Man is quiet at last
As he stands on the heights of his life with a glimpse of a height that is higher.'

"Perfection would do away with spurs to life and thought. The fact that man 'never is but always to be blest' is the source of happiness and advance. As Goethe vividly pointed out in Faust:

"'He only earns his freedom and existence
Who daily conquers them anew.'

"There are always in existence the contending forces of degeneracy, or suppressive evolution, and development. The balance between these two forces permits of their acting in unison. Degeneracy during this balance sweeps away useless structures. If, however, there be cessation of advance, degeneracy inevitably attacks gains already achieved. Under a condition, therefore, where everything is harmonized and all is perfect, the spur for advance is removed and degeneracy has full sway. Every evil has its beneficial side. War is the source of much altruistic feeling and hence of advance. Unwarlike nations always degenerate. In no small degree the bitter picture of Tennyson's 'Maud' depicts a warless world:

"'Peace sitting under her olive, and slurring the days gone by,
When the poor are hovel'd and hustled, each sex like swine;
When only the ledger lives, and when only not all men lie;
Peace in her vineyard—yes; but a company forges the wine.'

"War arouses the secondary ego in a potent way not only through

"'The stern joy which warriors feel
In foemen worthy of their steel,' but likewise through tenderness toward the wounded and the captive. Early in evolution the last factors developed powerfully a regard for others."

BABYHOOD.

What is the little one thinking about?
Very wonderful things, no doubt!
Unwritten history!
Unfathomed mystery!
Yet he laughs and cries and eats and drinks,
And chuckles and crows and nods and winks,
As if his head were as full of kinks
And curious riddles as any sphinx!
Warped by colic and wet by tears,
Punctured by pins and tortured by fears,
Our little nephew will lose two years;
And he'll never know
Where the summers go—
He need not laugh, for he'll find it so.

Who can tell what a baby thinks?
Who can follow the gossamer links
By which the manikin feels his way
Out from the shore of the great unknown,
Blind, and wailing, and alone,
Into the light of day?
Out from the shore of the unknown sea,
Tossing in pitiful agony—
Of the unknown sea that reels and rolls,
Specked with the barks of little souls—
Barks that were launched on the other side,
And slipped from heaven on an ebbing tide!

What does he think of his mother's eyes?
What does he think of his mother's hair?
What of the cradle roof that flies
Forward and backward through the air?
What does he think of his mother's breast,
Bare and beautiful, smooth and white,
Seeking it ever with fresh delight—
Cup of his life and couch of his rest?
What does he think when her quick embrace
Presses his hand and buries his face
Deep where the hearts-throbs sink and swell
With a tenderness she can never tell,
Though she murmur the words
Of all the birds—
Words she has learned to murmur well?

Now he thinks he'll go to sleep!
I can see the shadows creep
Over his eyes in soft eclipse,
Over his brow and over his lips,
Out to his little finger tips!
Softly sinking, down he goes!
Down he goes, down he goes!
See! he is hushed in sweet repose!

ONE UNIVERSAL ENERGY.

Slang Phrases and Their Occult Meaning.

The truth of Campbell's immortal statement that "Coming events cast their shadows before" is nowhere more fully exemplified than in the common slang of the street.

Truth has a way of clothing itself in homely attire and thus masquerading before the multitude in order that the cells of the human brain, a mirror in which we see nature reflected, may become adjusted to the new concept necessary in the operation or procedure of wisdom, wrongly named evolution.

Why should one ever say "No matter." At first blush there seems to be no relevancy whatever between the idea to be expressed and the phrase used. But chemistry, the court of last resort, has demonstrated that so-called matter is "no matter" but simply a phenomena or manifestation of energy commonly known as air, or oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen and other so-called elements. Prof. Huxley, one of the greatest material scientists and original thinkers the world has known, said in one of his last public addresses at an International Medical Congress in London, "Matter in its last analysis evades me," and again, "I now believe in one universal energy from which all things proceed." So then if so-called matter "proceeds" from energy it must be energy in concrete form, exactly as ice is vapor or water in concrete form.

We know that there is no such thing as ice per se, we know it is only a form of water. So by the operations of the spectroscope, X-ray and chemical analysis, we find that all forms of so-called matter are "no matter."

We have only recently discovered that so-called electricity is not a fluid or substance separate or distinct from the one universal or everywhere etheric substance, but an effect or jar produced by vibration. But, for a year or two before we found this wonderful truth the boys on the street were saying, "wouldn't that jar you?"

How did they come to take up the phrase? The following verse from my poem "The New Name" may not be out of place here:

"Vibrations of Etheric Substance,
Light flashing thro' regions of Space,
A girdle of Something, enfolding
And binding together the race,—
And words without wires transmitted,
"Ariel" winged, Spirit-sandaled and Shod—
Some call it Electricity,
And others call it God."

The chemists, all chemists everywhere, tell us we live and move and have our being in a universal highly attenuated element, and that all forms of so-called matter are condensations of this principle, whether vegetable, mineral or flesh and blood, and that, go where one may in space, lo! it is there. But the slang phrase "we are in it" has been the catch-word for some time as well as "we are up against the real thing."

Few people now-a-days believe that death ends all, or that the fleshly body is anything more than the clothing of the ego, or real man, who cannot be hurt by bullet, or knife nor disease nor cyclone, yet we can hardly think that the boy who says "won't do a thing to him" at all realizes that he could not do a thing to the spiritual man.

Emerson forcibly expressed the Hindoo philosophy relating to this great truth in his poem on Brahm, thus:

"If the red slayer thinks he slays
Or the slain thinks he is slain;
They little know the subtle ways
I come and pass and go again."

We used to say, "We won't do a thing to the Spaniards," and we did not. Every Spaniard that ever lived still lives. All life is eternal life.

"Come down from the perch," is literally obeyed by the daring aeronaut with his parachute, and "All right," pronounced millions of times daily by people of all beliefs, is the basis of occult and mental science emphasized by Pope in "Whatever is, is right." And so, if space permitted, one might go on almost indefinitely and illustrate how slang phrases are expressions foretelling the coming of a new phase of truth.

Great truths are always sensed and crudely expressed first by the common people. DR. GEO. W. CAREY.

I feel that I cannot do without The Progressive Thinker. Anyone who does not read it does not know what he is missing, or how far behind in knowledge he is compared with those who do read it, when they have completed their years of life in this stage of thought and action. I would advise all who wish to make progress in knowledge and spirituality and lay a good broad foundation for the life to come, to read The Progressive Thinker, and other literature produced by the thoughtful Spiritualists, both in this and the other life through the noted mediums of the day. A Good Move.

A step in the right direction seems about to be taken by the taxing authorities of Chicago, according to the statements of the daily press, to the effect that the board of review is to impose taxation upon church property that is not actually used for religious purposes.

There are immense properties held by church organizations in Chicago, and which are held and used as mere money-making investments, but have heretofore escaped taxation, under the state law that exempts from taxation property used for religious and educational purposes.

It is just, that this species of indirect compulsory taxation of the people, nonbelievers, for the support of churches and religion, should be abolished.

The whole system, as generally practiced, is unjust and a vicious imposition upon the non-church people, whose taxation is made higher because of the exemption of justly taxable church property.

It is a shame to the church, that the system of church exemption from taxation was not long ago abolished.

A Visit to a School in the Spirit World.

I threw a stone into the water one day
As on the banks I was idly dreaming the time away;
I watched the circles as they larger and larger grew,
Until out in the current they were lost to view.

I threw a thought into the air one day,
And I saw it grow in the self-same way;
Until all the summer air seemed rife
With the current of thought on the river of life.

In the following articles I have endeavored to give as clearly as possible an account of what I saw during my visit to my guide or teacher's school, which he tells me is organized upon the plan of the spheres, fitting young souls the same as our schools do here for the various positions and occupations which they will be called upon to occupy in the different spheres of spirit life. As each room is graded by colors, so is each sphere. No one need feel any repugnance to the reincarnation thought taught, for it is only brought about by our own growth and desire after absorbing all there is for us in all spheres. Then if we see a greater opportunity for advancement—some needed lesson we could not receive otherwise—we, by our own choice return to earth or some other planet, wherever what is needed for us is to be found. The artist who, leaving the tutelage of a Raphael or Michael Angelo, goes out into the artistic world to compete with other artists, may find his capabilities enlarged, a broader field opening out before him, and consequently a need for greater knowledge, and he returns again, perhaps but for a short time; or, doubtless, some other school of art is needed to add to what he has already gleaned, and therefore a new course is taken up to broaden and facilitate the one already begun. So the soul, ever unfolding, is being offered new opportunities, and it rests in its own power to grasp or to sleep on by the sluggish waters of inactivity, retarding or advancing as it may desire.

If these articles arouse but a few souls to the importance of so fitting themselves that they may go to their guides, instead of drawing them to their own materially tainted atmosphere and using them for their material benefit, they will have served their purpose. There is but one object in life from protoplasm to God-man—character building.

In order to leave all earth conditions behind in taking these journeys, one not only lays down his earthly covering, but his astral or second garment, and takes on a purely atmospheric body. I was visiting the Port Orchard dry docks a few days after taking the journey about which I am writing, and while sitting on the banks of Puget Sound there was washed up to my feet what appeared to be an immense drop of solidified water. As soon as I had it in my hand I knew it to be a small jellyfish, and placing it on a tiny piece of board I pushed it out into the stream with a fanciful thought that I was wafting it on its journey. While closely watching the piece of wood, still in reach of my hand, my tiny passenger faded from view. I searched long and earnestly for it, but found it not. A little farther down the shore I found another jellyfish and laid it on a stone, and the first tiny wave covered it from my view; and with several others I had the same result. I then discovered that my fish was there, but being composed of particles like the water, when its native element covered it, to my sight it was gone.

The modus operandi of these journeys I will explain through private correspondence if so desired. To the neophyte they are attended with great dangers, but to the advanced student they can be accomplished without harm; and I claim the knowledge gained in this way is much more apt to be true than through the ordinary controls.

When my guide first called, my astral was too weighted down to respond properly, for after leaving the earthly form I was weak and unable to carry my head erect. After much assistance from my guide I grew stronger, and I should judge it was about this time that one of the earth friends sitting by my side made the remark that she saw me leaving, dressed just as I saw myself, and that my guide said to her, "You cannot go any farther with us." I now know the reason, for I was just about to throw aside the last semblance of earthly raiment, and like the jellyfish I returned to my native element and she could not see me in my atmospheric body; but, like my predecessor, it did not alter the fact of my existence. My guide and the soul of an earth friend said, "Go! See yonder star, my beloved; even beyond that you are to travel." We were standing upon the steps of a great arched temple, and slowly I saw my heavy white astral garments fading away until I stood perfectly nude. Then I gathered from the atmosphere my soft misty draperies of ether blue.

O, for the time to come when we shall have learned that the air is our great storehouse, and that all we need is garnered there, and that we may learn how to reach forth our hands to grasp what is necessary for our growth. My body assumed a clear, transparent appearance, and looking at my guide I observed that he was similarly clothed; and we were equipped for our journey.

The process of arriving at our destination seemed to be somewhat similar to a journey upon a railroad train, that is, with regard to the swiftly moving scenery. I saw temples and cities flying apparently like birds past my view, and myriads of worlds in process of formation, and I caught a deep "tom-tom" of vibration as though one great musical note was being struck in harmony, and, like a stone thrown into the water, the sound seemed to strike the atmosphere and rings sprang forth like the rings of Saturn and circled out into quivering bands and colors.

On and on we sped, feeling truly, with Emerson, that we had hitched our wagon to a star and the rumbling of its wheels was lost in the music of the spheres.

"Do you wish to visit my school in the fifth sphere?" my guide asked. As it had been the dream and desire of my life to know more of his work, he knew my reply.

First color: Red—Strength, material or spiritual. All colors must be read according to condition.

We stood upon the steps of a white marble building, and as we ascended to the top we entered a high arched doorway and passed down a long corridor. A soft radiance as of mellow twilight pervaded everywhere. We turned to the right, and passing through a closed door, we were fairly flooded by a brilliant blaze of warm, soothing, strengthening, life-giving red rays. The room seemed to be one mass of the most beautiful red glow I ever saw or felt. The floor was covered with velvety red poppies. My guide afterward told me that there was not one thing in this room that was of the color red, but that all, all, wherever I might be, was white. He said that the red rays were being concentrated from the sun for the purpose of giving the proper unfoldment to the occupants of the room, which I now observed was filled with what appeared to be little swinging baskets supported by naught that I could see. Over each basket was thrown a soft downy covering of the finest texture, and in each one was a little nude soul, or baby, as it would be called in terrestrial language. These souls I was told were poor little creatures who had been born into earth conditions under some unfortunate circumstances, or in the primary evolution of life, such as not having been in the darkness of the generative organs long enough, or having been left to starve in the prison house of a purely materialistic body; and some were new souls that had not been embodied long enough in earth conditions to have strength sufficient to take upon themselves any work in spirit life until they had passed through this course of education.

My guide continued: "Now remember, my pupil, my school is only one among the many thousands of schools in spirit, the same as you have upon the planet earth; and the process of education varies the same as it does with you, that is, according to the needs and growth of the individual. Some of these red ray souls have been embodied only once in human expression, and their period of spiritual gestation will be longer and their growth consequently slower; while some of my little charges are very near the last or twelfth incarnation, and after a short period of rest from a life on earth of constant effort and work they will take such rapid strides that they will be ready to enter the seventh grade, or violet ray, from which they will pass into the holy of holies—into the purely spiritual and electrical realm, whence come the world's Messiahs. Thus you see the same difference existing here as in terrestrial inhabitants.

"We do not reckon time by the changes of the moon, but by the changes of the soul. To illustrate: I have had placed in my charge three souls born into our sphere exactly at the same period according to your time reckoning, and all three may have been about the same age when the change, called by you death, took place. Notwithstanding all that, their ages might vary months, years and aeons, for one may be a soul of but a day's human embodiment, another of years, and another may have almost completed its cycle of twelve."

Before we left this room I observed that two sides of it were composed of what appeared to be cut glass windows. The panes were about ten by twelve inches in size, and the windows reached from the floor to the ceiling. Through this spectroscope the glorious life-giving red rays seemed to concentrate with incalculable force, the pure white panes radiating only the red solar spectrum.

We passed from this room and entered an exact counterpart in size and the arrangement of windows; but in place of the red rays we were baptized in a rich orange glow, and the floor was carpeted with golden buttercups. Here the little souls had begun to unfold into consciousness, and I observed among the many groups of children, ranging, apparently, from the age of three to ten years, two little girls who were kneeling down upon the flowery carpet placing rings or circles of light, of various colors, one upon another. As they came to the orange rings the little golden haired child's eyes were caught by its similarity to her surroundings, and the little soul began to ask itself what was the meaning of all this, and then the first step was taken in her unfoldment. As we stood watching them she looked up and sprang toward us, with something clasped closely in her hand. As she drew near I seemed to see my guide and myself reflected in her eyes, glorified by her baby soul's love. We stood at the open door, bathed in the glorious flood of orange light, its radiant beauty baptizing us with the golden glory of the Father's throne, and through it we shone with a soft misty radiance—he, my guide, tall and kingly, uncrowned save by the glory of his own grand soul, and a woman fair and stately, her draperies taking on the tint of the dewy morn, waiting upon the threshold of the new-born day for the coming of her Sun God. A star shone with its clear penetrating ray in the center of her forehead, and in her hand was lightly held a scepter with a star tipped top. As I saw all this reflected in the eyes of the approaching child I realized again that I saw my own soul untouched by one atom of materiality. Softly the child's voice like silver chimes fell upon my ear: "See this strange little flower. I never found one of that color before, and the Master," giving my guide such a look of love and veneration as, had I earned it, I should not consider a thousand thorns in life too dear a price to pay, "said that I could give it to you." And she pressed into my bosom a tiny forget-me-not, and as it nestled there my whole body took on its delicate tint.

For the benefit of your readers who did not see the account of my first journey some four years ago, published in the columns of your paper, I will state that my guide under most uplifting inspirational conditions at that time gave me a forget-me-not, and to me it is the symbol of all that is highest and noblest in my womanhood; and again, about one year ago, in the presence of my class, two sprays were materialized and dropped into my hand, one for myself and one for a member of the class, who has since grasped and is making use of these higher truths in a way that explains why she, out of the twelve, should be especially chosen to receive it. To test the matter, I called the next day at the city florist's, and the answer was ever the same, "None in market—too early."

Third color: Yellow, Knowledge.

After leaving the orange-tinted room we entered what appeared to be a garden of Marshal Neil roses and their delicate tint mingled with the velvety green of the leaves. There were no walls here, just the soft light one sees and feels in a glorious morning of earth life. Here were youths and maidens seemingly attending to the wants and growth of this beautiful garden. One youth, upon observing our entrance, advanced toward us holding in his outstretched hand a beautiful unfolding rose, and as he handed it to me he said, with the same loving look I had observed in the child's eyes, "We as a rule are not allowed to pluck the flowers, for all life is one and all life is sacred, but the Master said I may give this to you." I asked why it was especially plucked for me, and he replied, "Because thou art an earth child yet and could not fully enjoy its beauty without possessing it, and we"—once more that divine glance toward my guide—"want your visit with us to be without one unsatisfied longing."

As we passed from this fair place my guide said: "There they are beginning to know, knowledge like the unfolding rose is opening out before them, and they are learning the first great lesson, that all life is one. Now come and see, as we leave the yellow ray of knowledge we enter the next grade, power; for when souls begin to know, then comes power and the intense desire to utilize that power."

Fourth color: Green, Power.

We then came to what appeared to be an ordinary school-room and I observed groups of souls at various desks and tables. They seemed so intensely interested in their work that they did not observe our entrance. As before, I singled out one group, and watching closely I saw that they had something in their hands resembling little telegraph instruments, and they were concentrating not the rays of the sun, but of their own eyes, upon the delicate machinery. Then, like flashes of vivid lightning at play in the heavens on a miniature scale, I saw green rays darting in every direction. They then assumed a more systematic order, darting out into long slender threads of green light. I followed by my soul sight and saw them reach the earth sphere and, with their delicate vibrations, come in touch with sensitive loved ones, who "received a thought" from that sphere; and if they were perfectly attuned to that vibration, harmony was the result and they were cheered by the knowledge, but, if not, the loved one in the spirit sphere was not discouraged but knew that in all good time all effort is rewarded.

In this ray grade, as in all others, I was very anxious to remain longer and see more of the work. But my guide said that I might come again at some future time and learn more, but that now we were limited and that he wished me to understand the order upon which his school was conducted, and when I came again I could remain in one grade until I had learned all I desired; so with that promise I was content.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial, postpaid. THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

WORDSWORTH.

The Famed Poet of Rydal Mount.

Thine is a strain to read among the hills,
The old, and full of voices; by the source
Of some free stream whose gladdening presence fills
The solitude with sound; for in its course,
Even such is thy deep song, that seems a part
Of those high scenes, a fountain from their heart. —Hemans.

The universe is one great harp whose strings are kept in tune by God himself. A mysterious harp, whose soleinn sounds fill all things with harmony. Spirits invisible hover over it; nature's high minstrels, in whose power this instrument sends forth music such as angels love, and the echo of this music, obeying the laws of sound, travels on through the realms of eternity, passes its borders, and descends to this lower world to waken and inspire with melody and song the hearts of men. The true poet feels the stirring of these unseen chords, and hears and responds to their lofty strains. "His intellect is the chorus of divinity," and from his spirit, rays of light, love and wisdom, continually radiate. He wields a power beautiful as mysterious, filling, or capable of filling, his own and the souls of others with indescribable pleasures. A gift is his, which, if properly cultivated, will yield him pure joy and a glorious immortality. If he adds to it the jewels of true wisdom, if he labors in the fields of Thought, for the good of humanity, battling against the enemies of light, and contending valiantly for the elevation of the race, he will become one whom nations will delight to honor, and on whom his grateful countrymen will shower their blessings.

Such an one was the subject of our sketch—Wordsworth, the world renowned poet of Rydal Mount. Well may England be proud to own him as her son, for the altar of her literature hath received, in the emanations of his genius, an offering which shall be as deathless as the stars of heaven. Nature's own bard was he; her light was to him the light of truth and beauty; her songs the essence of an invisible spirit. Listening to the voice of her inspiration, he went forth to her sanctuaries, and became the interpreter of her oracles.

"Early had he learned to reverence the volume
That displays the mystery, the life which cannot die;
But in the mountains he did feel his faith."

Shrinking from the din and bustle of a great city, and conscious of a feeling within which could never be tamed by the confusion of business, he sought and dwelt amid those places most congenial to his peculiar disposition. The green old woods and rocky wastes where solitude sits upon her antique throne, threw around him their hallowed charms, and wooed him to their quiet homes. The eternal voice of Nature, filling with her songs the whispery shades, had to him a sybil power which wrapped his inner being in a spell too strong to break. To read her mysteries, he left the haunts of men. The trees became to him familiar friends; the ceaseless prattle of the rippling brook, his music; and the far off stars his guardian angels. "'Tis beautiful to think of him as the inspired worshiper of God's most wondrous works. In early life, when most young men dream only of amassing a fortune, it was his delight to wander amid the solitudes of Nature's wilds, and free to follow out the train of his high thoughts, catch a gleam of song from the light which flowed into his soul, or listen to the wild, quick music of the wind, borne o'er rustling reed harps.

"A humming bee, a little tinkling rill,
A pair of falcon, wheeling on the wing
In clamorous agitation, round the crest
Of a tall rock, their airy citadel."
All things which are, and which have music in them,
Thrilled deep the chords within, and wakened there
The power and harmony of song and love.

Accompanied by his brother poets, Coleridge and Southey, with what enthusiasm did he wander over the solitary fields, and down the heathery hillside. This literary coterie, says Howett, had made the sublime discovery that true poetry was based on nature, and that it was found by looking into their own minds, and into the world around them. Therefore they sought not the gay metropolis, but the courts and shrines of Nature, where they could not only hold free communion with the invisible life which pervades all things, but where they could store up treasures of imagery full of beauty and truth, to be woven, in after years, into the glowing tissues of their own thoughts. To this life of seclusion, says the same author, Wordsworth, with Coleridge, adhered all their after life. As a consequence of this retirement, the poet was enabled to enrich the world of letters with an entire new system of poetry.

Conscious of the fires which burned in secret upon the altars of his heart, he resolved to follow no pursuit in life but that of administering to the deathless flame within, and true to his purpose, regardless of all that men might do or say, he continued to follow the course best calculated to mature his poetic genius. He felt

"How feelingly religion may be taught
In smoky cabins, from a mother's tongue."

For him

"The clouds were touched with glory,
And in their silent faces could be read
Unutterable love. Sound needed none,
Nor any voice of joy; his spirit drank
The spiritual; sensation, soul, and form,
All melted into him—they swallowed up
His animal being; in them did he live—
They were his life."

Thus did his mind absorb into itself "beauty, the living presence of the earth." Thus did he, at the fountain head of all inspiration, receive into his heart the smile, the gladness of the Eternal. Thus did he drink in rich draughts of peace and song, and learn to rise superior to the opinions of others. But idle curiosity did follow and annoy him even in his lone retreats. It became the object of the simple inhabitants of Somersetshire, to find out what had brought a stranger to their woods and glens. His sister, Coleridge and his wife, Southey, Cottle and Charles Lamb accompanied him thither, and it is not to be wondered at, that this knot of friends, young, full of enthusiasm and dreams of poetry, should become a source of the greatest wonder to these ignorant people, whose ideas of an honest man were only associated with those of some honorable, visible employment. Nor did the personal appearance of Wordsworth tend greatly to correct their unfavorable opinions. He was, we learn, always a solemn looking mortal, and as he lived in a large house in a very solitary place, he became of all the most offensive to the simple inhabitants. One said he had seen him wandering about, looking strangely at the moon, and that he roamed over the hills like a partridge. Another said he had heard him mutter in some outlandish brogue that no one could understand. Another thought him a wise man, a conjurer. But the more general belief was, that he was a smuggler, because he went tramping away to the sea side; and would any man in the world take all that trouble to look at a parcel of water? They thought not; and that they might rid themselves of so suspicious a personage, they refused him the lease of the house he had occupied; and thus they drove from among them the brightest ornament which had ever graced their soil, Wordsworth, and his poor sister. Thus strangely did the ignorant judge him, thus strangely use him. They could not look upon the lofty creations of the poet, or follow him in his high soarings. They knew not that, though he seemed to live among them, he in reality dwelt in a clime to the empyrean heights of which their darkened minds might never mount. Yet thus it is with the world: when they know the least of a person, they condemn the most severely.

Bristol, the birth-place of Chatterton and Southey, had the honor of issuing to the world the first productions of Wordsworth. His poetry was of a style so novel, with so much of nature in it, that those whose business it was to sit in judgment upon the works of this eminent poet, could see no merit in them. The writers of the Edinburg Review gravely pronounced the sentence upon his Excursion, and declared, "this would never do; there was not a particle of sense in it"—an assertion which required but a short time to falsify; for, in spite of all their cutting sarcasm, the world soon plainly declared it would do, and immediately Wordsworth became an acknowledged poet. Literature soon was proud to own him as her own bright star. But he, neither disheartened by criticism nor flattered by praise, continued to draw new and purer draughts from the fountain of inspiration. In his poetry there was a philosophy to which none had heretofore attained. It was, as Howitt beautifully expresses it, "the pure spirit of Quakerism infused into the living soul of poetry. He believed in that passive state in which light is poured into the heart from an invisible but never failing fountain. He sought that mental illumination, which pierces the mysteries of things unseen, and brings us into direct communion with the spirit of the universe, and into contact with all knowledge." He looked into the life of things, and became what nature designed him, a great poet. Yet there were other virtues which served to win for him an undying fame: these were pure principles, and his firm attachment to domestic life. Dwelling in the bosom of his family, his years flowed on like the gentle current of a stream, upon whose surface scarce a ripple has been seen to play. His devotion to his only sister, the companion of his youthful wanderings, and the sweet sharer of all his bright dreams, is alone sufficient to endear him to every heart. Her he never forsook, though the light of her mind grew dim, and went out in darkness, ere the spark of life expired; for "in the shooting gleam of her wild eye" there was a something, a spell, a power, which brought to him a dream of buried hours, and he cherished and loved her still, throwing around her the tender ties of affection, though the heart that once beat to the music of his own was dead to all its former emotion. Thus did this noble spirit weave the tissues of his future greatness, with the golden thread of love and virtue, and for this his country honors him, and his name, with the sweet incense of generous deeds; has come to us from over the restless main, and we too are proud to speak his praise. His fame shall not pass from earth as a vain shadow. Every spot he visited will be held as sacred. But there is one place round which thought delights most to linger. Eloquent with the voice of his songs, breathed upon by his spirit, sanctified by his genius, a ray of glory shall descend and rest upon Mount Rydal forever.

BELLE BUSH.

Clinton Camp, Iowa.

Our camp-meeting opened at Mt. Pleasant Park, Clinton, Iowa, Sunday morning, July 27. Although the rain poured down in torrents, a nice audience welcomed President Peck as he delivered the opening address. The clouds cleared away and the sun shone beautifully in the afternoon when H. D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A., gave one of his masterful discourses, which was followed by a most interesting seance by Mrs. Georgia Cooley.

The park is beautiful with its wealth of foliage and grass dotted here and there with bright, blooming flowers. The air is clear at this elevation, and the days delightful, while the nights are cool and conducive to perfect rest.

We see The Progressive Thinker in the hands of many and it will undoubtedly find its way into many homes.

The people are coming in and tents and cottages are filling up.

Sunday, August 3, will be Labor Day. President Peck will speak in the morning upon "The Man With the Hoe." In the afternoon Miss Harlow, of Massachusetts, will address the audience, with a test seance afterward by Mrs. Cooley. In the evening an exhibition of moving pictures will be given in the pavilion.

Mr. J. H. Altemus has found it impossible to be with us, and we have engaged in his place Mrs. Maggie Waite, who is so well and favorably known.

Mr. and Mrs. Kates will be with us the last week, and there will be plenty of phenomena on the platform as well as most talented lectures.

Mrs. Jennie H. Brown will be with us the third and fourth Sundays. Our program assures a feast to all of our visitors.

Mrs. C. B. Bliss and Mr. Concannon are on the grounds, holding materializing seances. There are mediums of nearly all phases. Everyone is invited to come.

ORATORY.

As It Was Taught, and as It Is.

Fifty years ago the elocution taught was mechanical, stilted and permanently injurious. The rules were stiff and hard. The form was cultivated at the expense of the substance. The idea of basing the expression of oratory on the foundation of the understanding had not dawned upon the pedagogic mind. The climaxes of great speeches and great poems were selected for declamation. They were memorized, but not understood.

In after life, when the boys had grown into men, and come to speak, not the climaxes of another, but the simple thought of their own brains, it was so difficult to keep from making fools of themselves by trying to make it all strenuous climax. Many of them never succeeded in throwing off the artificiality and becoming natural.

The modern system, oh, how beautifully changed! To understand the meaning of what is said is about all there is of it. The modern educational psychology science largely did it. Herbert Spencer, more than any other one man, helped to develop and regulate this reform. In natural speaking, the larger part of the speech is anything but climaxes, and requires an appropriate, quiet manner. The student of a half century ago wasn't instructed in this important phase of elocution.

The ancients made oratory one of their greatest of influential forces. With them the first qualification of an orator was physical force. He must be able to speak, not only by the hour, but by the day, or week, if necessity seemed to demand it. And he must be as fresh at the end as at the beginning. The second was subject matter. The third was correct phraseology. The fourth and last was appropriate intonation, posturing and gesticulation.

Of the present, most modern systems of oratory Charles Wesley Emerson, president of the Emerson College of Oratory, Boston, says: "Oratory, as an art, is dignified, and inspiring. It is potent in its appeal to all sorts and conditions of men. It is the most potent of all the arts, in the sense that it is the one most inseparable from the personality of the artist. Hence its development involves the personal culture of the individual.

"What is demanded of the orator? He must have a message for the world; he must be able to direct all the powers of his being toward imparting that message. Here, then, we have the two-fold basis of true oratorical training; it must have reference to that quantity of being which we call character,—for one cannot express—'press out'—what is not within; it must seek to lead out that which is within, through the avenue of the physical agents, in adequate expression. It must be a continued process of holding beautiful and truthful objects of thought before the individual.

"Oratory is advocacy. A cynic cannot be an orator. The great orator has more than ordinary faith in human nature. Let no orator complain of what people think. He must compel their thoughts. Pretense has no power to move men. Oratory is conversation elevated. One may speak colloquially and still flame with eloquence. An artist uses few lines but they are bold ones. The primary endeavor of the speaker or reader must be to interest the audience in his theme. One must speak out of the needs of the audience, else he is no orator. The orator must have everything within him that makes a warrior strong and a saint holy. Avoid introspection while speaking. That you are purposing to do a thing is the best evidence that you are doing it. One must become like a little child in oratory, as elsewhere, if he would enter the kingdom of heaven. The minds of an audience are the canvas upon which the orator paints pictures. Clean-cut thought will reveal itself in clean-cut articulation. An orator is an advocate, not a critic. If called upon to condemn, one must do it by elevating the ideal. The world wants no imitators, but men and women of creative power. There is a difference between positiveness and aggressiveness. Oratory is a power to make an audience act upon the truth. An orator speaks with his audience, not to them. Performance may command admiration and wonder; unity of expression, impelled by consecrated purpose, commands the soul. The things that do not attract attention are often the things that have the deepest influence. Progressiveness is not marked by mere force of voice. As we progress we approach the heart of things. An orator must present the thing itself, rather than the facts about the thing. 'I am come that you may have life' must be the undeclared text of every discourse. Animation, which must become habitual in an orator, is not dependent upon loudness of voice. Only continuity of thought will produce smoothness of tone."

In brief, the up-to-date oratory is to have the subject matter well mastered, and then study to make the manner correspond with the varying thought.

Three students were examined in the Wisconsin University. One was marked ninety, another seventy, and the other fifty, from the standpoint of excellent memorizing. The final marking was changed, and the highest was put back to seventy; the next highest back to fifty; and the lowest was put up to ninety. The reason was, the lowest in memorizing was the highest in understanding.

The new educational system exacts nothing in the way of having the student respond in the language of the book or the teacher; but everything in understanding. The day of parrot memorizing is past. In after life he must use his own language to tell what he knows, and, to make the college more practical, he is led to commence his life work then and there. Considerable credit is due the college for the progress it makes, but a large share of it is compelled by the outside world of thinkers and students.

Oratory is really a very simple matter, when understood from the standpoint of nature, developed intelligence, and honesty. E. W. BALDWIN.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

President Barrett is scheduled to attend thirteen camp-meetings in almost as many states between this time and fall.

St. Joseph, Mo., July 29.—Mrs. Chas. R. Woodruff, wife of a traveling man of this city, was fatally injured in a runaway to-day, and the instant the accident occurred, Mr. Woodruff, the husband, who was in Omaha on business, became aware of the fact. He says he received a nervous shock and instinctively ran to the long distance telephone to call for his residence number in this city. His wife's sister answered the telephone and apprised him of the nature of the accident, which coincided in every respect with the mysterious monitor's warning. He arrived here to-night.—Chicago Tribune.

The Oklahoma Christian Spiritualist Association will hold meetings, beginning Saturday evening, August 9, at Cedar Top school house, two miles west of Retrop, Washita county, holding over two Sundays. They will be conducted by Rev. T. W. Woodrow. Good speakers will be present able to present clearly from the Bible and individual experience the fact of immortality demonstrated. It is expected that there will be present those able to give messages from our loved ones passed beyond the change called death. The service will be the beginning of an association. Free opportunity to ask questions. All invited to attend. Services at 11 a. m. and 8 p. m., Sunday, Aug. 10.

Nora Carrothers writes from Denver, Col.: "I came here from New York to visit the much-advertised Boulder Camp. If you appreciate Spiritualism as much as I do, then warn all mediums and speakers not to visit the Boulder Camp, for should they do so, there is great disappointment in store for them."

William Fitch Ruffle, psychometrist and test medium, holds circles every Wednesday and Friday evenings at 8 p. m., at 1069 North Halsted street, near Lincoln. Sunday services at 3 and 8 p. m.

G. E. Kesson writes: "Two years ago I began to study Spiritualism, and it has opened up a new world to me, and it has brought peace, happiness and comfort to my soul, and now I could not live without The Progressive Thinker, and I thank you very much that you have made it possible for me to get all those beautiful premium books at so low a rate."

M. T. Wood writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "The paper and book—A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands—were received yesterday by my mother, and she wished me to write and tell you how delighted she is with both."

The following from London, Eng., appears in Hearst's Journal of New York: "I'll tell you a strange thing that happened to me once," said Mr. Phillips, and he laid his knife down, as though psychics and cheese would not blend. "My wife and I had taken a little house for the season in Surrey. Beerbohm Tree wanted me to go to Marienbad with him, in order to discuss 'Herod,' and I went. When I returned my wife met me at the station and told me that nothing on earth would induce her to live any longer in the Surrey house. She had heard horrible noises, and every night the wailing of a child kept them all awake. I did not laugh at her, for those things do not appeal to me as they do to others, as ridiculous. I determined to investigate, and I wrote to the late F. W. H. Myers, of the Society for Psychical Research. Mr. Myers sent a man down, and gave us particular instructions not to tell him what we had heard, or to give him any clew whatsoever as to the kind of noises that had disturbed us. The man came down, slept a night in the house, and returned to London. We had no intercourse with him at all. Later on Mr. Myers wrote us that after due investigation they had discovered that a child had once been murdered in this particular house. I thought it and still think it remarkable. For it was the wailing of a child that had annoyed us, and we had not mentioned the fact to the investigator. That, I may say, is the only psychic experience I ever had."

T. F. Scruby writes from Cedar Vale, Kans.: "The Arkansas Valley Spiritualist Association will hold its annual meeting in Hewin's Park, Cedar Vale, Kans., September 7 to 21. The grounds are in excellent condition; abundance of shade, water, etc. Prominent mediums and speakers of national reputation will be in attendance. Nice tents, large and roomy, can be had, and everything will be done to make this the best meeting ever held by this association. Papers in Kansas please copy."

Geo. Heffner writes: "I cannot tell you how much I appreciate your paper. It is amazing to think of the feast of good things you are giving us for so little money. I congratulate you on your efforts."

The Leader, of Eau Claire, Wis., says: "The Leader a few days ago told of the mysterious disappearance of a coffee-pot containing $130 in cash and $1,000 in checks, at the Scandinavian Hotel on Galloway street. Louis Nelson and wife conduct the hotel. The other day Nelson went into the country; during his absence Mrs. Nelson took a roll of bills containing $130 in cash and a package containing $1,000 in checks from her husband's trunk, and placing the wealth in an old coffee-pot hid the pot in the woodshed back of the hotel. She said that she was afraid that some person would break into the trunk and steal the money and checks. When Nelson returned home the coffee-pot could not be found. Chief of Police Higgins and Sergeant Elliott were called in and worked on the case, but no clue could be found. Nelson as a last resort went to Minneapolis and consulted a fortune-teller, and, so the story goes, was told by her that the coffee-pot and contents would be found in the cellar of the hotel saloon, on a shelf; that he returned to Eau Claire last night on the Omaha limited, and went at once to the spot indicated by the fortune-teller and there found the pot and contents. He says the fortune-teller gave him a minute account of the exact spot where he would find the coffee-pot and described the other articles near it on the shelf."

E. R. Kidd writes: "Mr. William Way, a rising young medium of Wheeling, W. Va., has been in Canton, Ohio, for two weeks, and is doing much good. Mr. Way's phase is trance mediumship, and between his public circles and private readings, he is a busy man. His seances are opened with a good lecture, the influence controlling him being a bright spirit, and following the lecture fully an hour is taken up with messages and tests, given by spirit Nellie Davis. Mr. Way expects to remain in Canton until September."

Mrs. J. W. Kenyon filled engagements during the past season in Fitchburg, Worcester, Brocton, Salem, Boston, Mass.; Providence and Pautucket, R. I. She is re-engaged to these and other societies. She has a few open dates for which she can be addressed at 95 North street, Fitchburg, Mass.

The Indianapolis Sentinel says: "To a small audience of inquisitive people W. P. Adkinson made an attempt, at the meeting of the Theosophical society last night, to prove the existence of a highly developed civilization at the North pole. His argument was based first on analogy, second on the tales of Rider Haggard, Jules Verne and others of that ilk, and third on the unchallenged authority of Mme. Blavatsky. The confluence of electric currents at the pole was pointed out as a cause of inhabitability, and all the other arguments used by those who have advanced this theory were reiterated. The speaker held that this favored race was composed of philosophers and 'masters of wisdom,' who were thus isolated by impassable barriers that they might pursue uninterrupted the study of great and vital problems. Thus, he said, are the great teachers of the East hidden in the secluded fastnesses of Thibet, where a wonderful and unapproachable civilization now exists. Dr. Adkinson thinks people here can never get to this happy land in the flesh, but will be obliged to be able to function upon another plane before they can satisfy curiosity in regard to the septentrional population. He stated that nobody had ever been able to penetrate into the happy hunting grounds of Thibet, where a race of wise and philanthropic philosophers dwell. When an inquisitive person in the audience wanted to know about Dr. Sven Hedin, who claimed to have narrowly escaped death at the hands of irresponsible savages in that region, Dr. Adkinson opined that Hedin had lied about it."

Laura Matlock, secretary, writes: "The annual mid-summer meeting for the election of officers of the Michigan State Spiritualists Association, will be held in Lansing, Tuesday, August 12. We look forward to a large attendance, and hope the local societies will put forth an extra effort to send as many delegates as their membership will allow."

A curious instance of the telepathic transmission of thought occurred on the fast sound steamers, the Peck and the Payne. The handsome boats were crowded with people. They were steaming busily toward their respective ports when their passengers simultaneously, as it appears, conceived the idea, or received it, that the boats were racing. It is true that the Peck and the Payne were making tracks in the same general direction, and that one of them had more boilers going than usually is the case, but they were not racing. Of this there is not a shadow of doubt. The agents of both boats say they were not. The idea that they were gained credence, on both vessels, widely separated though they were by deep water. If the idea of a race had been confined to the Peck it might be claimed that somebody started the story of a race, and that the story was passed around. But it was also current on the Payne, which compels recourse to the only theory that will account for the phenomena, the theory of telepathy, or the unaided transmission of thought. How happened it that afternoon that the Peck moved faster than the Payne? Could the thought have originated on the Payne? Could the Peck have received an impulse from that thought simultaneously entertained by the multitude on the Payne, and did this impulse, this thought of a race furnish the Peck additional power not available to the Payne? We would like to know.—New Haven (Ct.) Palladium.

Lewis R. Hillier, of Gloucester, Mass., writes: "The following method, if persevered in, will wonderfully strengthen the memory. Every night on retiring and just as you are about to fall asleep, you should think to yourself that your memory is growing stronger daily. That you will be able to easily recall anything which you wish to recollect. Talk to your subjective mind by thought. Tell yourself that your memory will have to grow stronger because you will that it should grow stronger. Treat yourself thus, not once but every night. Do not concentrate too hard, but just hold the thought, as you go to sleep. If you obey this simple rule, you will be surprised at the results."

Maggie Waite writes: "Last Sunday, July 27, I closed my meetings until September, with a full house. I leave here for Clinton Camp, where I am engaged as platform test medium. At the close of that camp I journey to the camp at Marshaltown, Iowa, to serve, engagement the first twelve days, and then return to Chicago about the middle of September. I take up my same old quarters at 3160 Wabash avenue. All mail can be addressed to Mt. Pleasant Park Camp, Clinton, Iowa."

Mrs. Laura B. Payne is in Texas, doing excellent missionary work. The secretary of the Hillsboro Society, John S. Capps, writes: "Mrs. Laura B. Payne, missionary, arrived here July 13, and on the following evening and on Sunday evening, she lectured at Odd Fellows' Hall. After an introduction by your scribe, she very impressively rendered a solo to the delight of the audience. The first evening her subject, Spiritualism, was well received. The second night her subject was Hypnotism. It was very ably handled. On the following evening she was with the society again, to our pleasure and satisfaction. She did not desire to lecture, but to meet with our society. The evenings work elicited much inquiry. Our society was organized March 18, 1902, with nine members. We want to start a lyceum in the near future, and Mrs. Payne has promised to come and help us if she has the date to spare. We have had visit us Mr. John W. Ring, state president; Mr. and Mrs. Kates, Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, and lastly Mrs. Laura B. Payne, and we thank them for their kindly ministrations. We have had the best talent and can commend the same to any society. We feel sure that any one of the above will surpass your expectations and do you much good. I wish to say to the readers of The Progressive Thinker and societies in Texas, that Mrs. Payne will certainly meet your expectations; her singing and music will please you and her lectures are of a high order. I speak of her thus as she has just come into the state and you will miss a grand opportunity for a pleasant acquaintance if you don't see and hear her. She leaves sunshine and gladness in her wake."

A. Sisson writes: "Mrs. Clara Watson's late article in The Progressive Thinker was plain and sensible. I don't think there is the least danger that chapels, ordinations, christenings, or even re erends, will ever absorb such kind of Spiritualists as she is."

Titus M. Welsh writes from Beaver Falls, Pa.: "I venture to give a short account of one of a number of seances given by George Renner of Pittsburg, Pa., and James Caton, of Washington, Pa. Many communications were given through the trumpet, with names, and recognized by friends, also many physical manifestations that demonstrated that there were forces present other than those in the flesh. Some of the communications were spoken in German, and answered by members of the circle who recognized them, neither of the mediums being able to speak or understand German. The physical manifestations were varied and numerous, such as bringing hats from outside the circle and placing them on the heads of members of the circle, brushing of hair and whiskers of gentlemen, taking down the hair of ladies and putting of hair-pins in others' hair, playing of guitar and placing trumpets outside of circle, bringing of a toy cow into circle from another part of the room and manipulating it so as to make it bawl, and then place it in the lap of one of the circle. All of this took place with a closed circle, that is, the mediums were held by the hands by one on each side, and the circle closed by joining hands all around, and the members were changed at intervals so as to give all a chance to sit next to the mediums."

John Beyer, of Sterling, Kan., writes: "It has been a long time since we had anything to report from this place, so please allow me a little space in the columns of your much appreciated Progressive Thinker, the best paper on earth, according to my notion. During the past week we have been blessed by having the doors unlocked and the veil lifted through the mediumship of Mrs. Inez Wagner. We can only say that for the past week, afternoon and evenings, we have lived with our dear ones from the spirit side in such a reality that we all felt that there really is no break in our families. All we have received is true and beyond all criticism, because we have two good clairvoyants in the family who are sitting for development, and it would be a hard matter for any one to try and pan off any fraud on us. The voices that spoke to us through the trumpet were strong, and especially those of our families were so real and natural that they needed no introduction, but were recognized by every one present. We hope that the angel world will succeed in their promises to us, so that we may be able to bring this beautiful truth to this place, where the very atmosphere seems to be impregnated with orthodoxy, there being fifteen different denominations in a little hamlet of 2,700 souls. It will require considerable renovating to purify the atmosphere of superstition."

O. C. N. writes from West Superior, Wis.: "For the last three months, Mrs. Elizabeth Holmes, of Minneapolis, has lectured every Sunday evening in the Odd Fellows' temple, to a full house of eager listeners, and we regret to say that she, with her genial husband, Dr. F. C. Holmes, a healing medium, left us for their home, preparatory to their camp work during August. Mrs. Holmes as a trance lecturer is powerful and interesting, and in her work giving messages of love, knowledge and advice from the loved ones passed over, she has few equals. Her spare time here was busily occupied in giving private readings. Dr. Holmes seemed to possess strong magnetic powers as a healer, who can, no doubt, in time build up a reputation and good practice. They succeeded in organizing a small society before leaving, The Banner of Light, which has applied for a charter from the W. S. S. A., which we hope will stand fast, and take up the work where others left off. West Superior with Duluth across the Bay, has now a great ripe field open for the right ploughman and sower of good seed, and we hope yet to see the smouldering embers of the old organizations again fanned back into life and activity that the true knowledge of this life and the hereafter may be spread and awaken more souls to the reality and beauty of life and better understanding of the duties resting upon each and every one, as taught us by the greatest of teachers and reformers, to love and to do as we wish to be loved and done by."

Louise E. Zimmerman writes from Elmira, N. Y.: "Our society here has been doing good work, the interest and zeal being as great as when first organized. The attendance at the services increases, as also does the membership, and the outlook for the future promises much. During the month of August the church will be closed, to be opened again the first Sunday in September, when active work in the Lyceum and Ladies' Aid will begin for the coming year. Oh, that all humanity might come into the knowledge which maketh all mankind free, and realize their own divinity and relation to the universal spirit of All Good, coming into the at-one-ment with Truth."

Arthur F. Milton writes: "An honest God works in the light. The mysteries mystics, who are stealing the livery of heaven in which to masquerade as the only true revelators of things spiritual are deceiving themselves most woefully. The God or Master they have discovered must be some old-fashioned Jehovah, or estranged autocrat, who lacks occupation, and has seized an opportunity of gathering in the spiritually lame and halt—the weak and timid—the superstitious and credulous—in order to form a little heaven of his own. The mortal end of this ideal paradise is held together by titling its lambs as adepts and inspiring them with expressions that is to affect the unwary with awe, thereby whetting their spiritual appetites for more of their supposedly hidden light. A god that hides his light behind mystic circles cannot be straight. Confusion can only await converts to such 'Orders.'"

Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader, one of the brilliant workers of Philadelphia, Pa., was in the city last week. She visited the camp at Waukesha, Wis.

Mrs. G. Partridge started Sunday evening on a month's jaunt to her father's home at Cresco, Iowa, and to visit friends at various points in Minnesota.

G. W. Kates and wife have the following camp-meeting appointments: Island Lake, Mich., Aug 2 to 8; Grand Ledge, Mich., 10 to 15; Vicksburg, Mich., 16 to 18; Clinton, Iowa, 19 to 24; Waukesha, Wis., 26 to 31. They have only a few open week-nights during September, to be placed between Chicago and Erie, Pa. Address them as per route.

Hon. Alonzo Thompson, of Nebraska, passed through the city last week on his way to Lily Dale camp—his favorite place of resort.

Mrs. Dr. Edwards writes from Omaha, Neb.: "I have concluded to stay another month here. Every Sunday evening brings a larger crowd, so I have been obliged to take another hall in the Woodman Building. We will hold services every Sunday during August, and perhaps longer, as I have been obliged to pay quite a heavy license for the privilege of working here, as no license is given for less than six months. The people here have been kind and appreciative. Any medium who comes this way, should bring his license money along, for it is a fine of from five to twenty-five dollars for every reading without one. I have mine framed and hung up in the parlor. I shall always keep it as a souvenir, and a reminder that the days of intolerance are not over. I hope to be able to go to the Clinton camp, if only for a few days, before its close. This is a splendid field for a good medium who wants to locate permanently."

Allen Franklin Brown, the well known inspirational speaker and psychometrist, is lecturing at Passadena, Cal., and is open to engagements for fall and winter months. Engagement on Pacific coast preferred. Mr. Brown is said to be a pleasing speaker, a good psychometric reader and a successful children's lyceum worker, and a good organizer. Address him at No 124 50th avenue, Highland Park, Cal.

Camp Meeting at Seattle, Wash.

The camp-meeting now being held under the auspices of the Washington Spiritualist Association at Green Lake, opened July 27, on a cool, cloudy morning, with a fair attendance, which bids fair to increase rapidly.

Green Lake is a pleasant summer resort, about seven miles from the business centre of Seattle, and our electric cars carry us out there with as little delay as possible. Some untoward circumstance prevented Bro. Mills, our State President, from being present at the opening session, and Mr. Little, president of the Seattle Association presided.

We began with a very lively morning conference, the question considered being, "What are the evidences that Spiritualism is advancing the world?"

Mrs. Irene Smith delivered an afternoon lecture on the "Old and the New," and her glowing words and fervid enthusiastic delivery was highly appreciated.

The large tent which serves as our auditorium, was a bower of beauty and a very pleasant surprise to many of us. The great amount of work and the finish of the equipments made in so short a time after securing the grounds are really wonderful, and speak volumes for the disinterestedness and devotion of the dear brothers who took part in it. Our state secretary, Brother Julius Smith, and President Little particularly distinguished themselves in that way.

Our camp is located in a young fir grove. We have plenty of shade, also a good restaurant run by the W. S. A., which is liberally patronized.

We have taken our Seattle Lyceum to camp with us, and intend to be faithful in our duty to the children, and we rely confidently on the help of the angel world in the spiritual advancement of all who are privileged to attend the Washington Spiritualist camp-meeting.

Karen Traditions.

The following I copy from a book bought in early days.

Howard Malcolm, of Boston, Mass., was sent in 1837 to India and other parts of Asia, a missionary, to inspect the doing of the missions already established there, and gives a history of his researches there in two volumes, published in 1839.

In vol 2, p. 197, I find the following: "As to the Karens, they may almost be said to have no religion. The only religious teachers are a sort of prophets, called Bookhos, who predict events and are greatly venerated by the people. Besides these is a set of wizards—they pretend to cure diseases, to know men's thoughts, and to converse with the spirits. Their performances are fraught with awe and terror to a superstitious people. They begin with solemn and mysterious movements; presently their eyes roll wildly; then their body trembles and at length every muscle is agitated; while with frantic looks they utter oracles, or speak to a man's spirit and declare its response.

"Various traditions prevail among them which have a remarkable similarity to scripture facts. The following is a specimen. Our race began with a married pair who lived in happy innocence and abundance. Mo-kaw-le, or the devil, attempted to seduce them to partake of certain food which they had been commanded not to eat. They both listened and argued for some time, till the man, indignant and out of patience, would hear no more, and rising up went away. The woman continued to listen. Mo-kaw-le assured her that if she would take his advice, she should know all things, and be endowed with ability to fly in the air, or penetrate into the depth of the earth. That she might prove the truth of what he said, he begged her just to taste the least morsel, and she would know for herself. She began to hesitate and said, 'Shall we verily be able to fly?' Upon this Mo-kaw-le redoubled his protestations of ardent good will, and repeated the most flattering assurances, till the woman ate. Mo-kaw-le then praised her till she was induced to go and find her husband. He yielded after much coaxing. The next day God came and cursed them, saying, 'You shall become old; you shall be sick; you shall die.'"

On page 195 he says: "Truth, integrity, and hospitality are universal.

"For a Karen to lie or cheat, is scarcely known.

"Females are in no respect degraded. They are neither secluded nor kept at an unseemly distance, nor required to perform labor beyond their strength, nor treated with severity.

"Polygamy though allowed by the government under which they live, is accounted dishonorable, and seldom occurs."

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Opening of the Morris Pratt Institute, Tuesday, Sept. 30, 1902.

This institution of learning, situated at Whitewater, Wis., the first fully equipped and permanent school under the auspices of Spiritualism, will open its first year of instruction on Tuesday, September 30, 1902, with the following corps of instructors: Moses Hull, A. J. Weaver, Alfarata Jahnke and Mattie E. Hull. Others will be added as needed.

The instruction given will cover a two years' course of about 36 weeks each.

The first term will end with the holiday vacation in December. The second term will close with the end of the school year in June.

Branches taught—Covering the two years' course:

Higher Criticism of the Bible.

Spiritualism of the Bible, and other Ancient Literature.

Comparative Religions.

Oratory, Voice and Physical Culture, according to the Emersonian system.

General History.

Rhetoric, including the essentials of Grammar.

Exercises in Composition.

Preparation of Lectures and other platform work.

Physical Geography—the Causes of Things.

Evolution—A study of what it is as set forth by Darwin, Wallace, Huxley and Spencer.

Logic, both Deductive and Inductive.

General History of the Idea of a Future Life.

Class Sittings for Cultivation of the Psychic Powers.

General Development of Mediumship and Harmonious Soul Growth, including Instruction on Psychic Laws and Conditions.

Parliamentary Law will be taught practically in a Debating or Literary Club, which will be formed and conducted by the students and teachers in common.

Expenses—Tuition for year, $50; Tuition when one cannot attend the whole year, per week, $2.50.

Rooms and Board—Single room, in building, furnished, per week, $1; Double room, in building, furnished, per week, $.50; Board in the building will be conducted, probably on the co-operative plan, and the estimated cost per week will be about $2; board and room in private houses in the city, per week, $3.25.

Text Books—Can be obtained of teachers after arrival.

Admittance—Students will be admitted to the school without an educational examination.

Principles—The school will adhere strictly to the following general principles, absolutely fundamental in all true education:

Maintenance of the absolute individuality of each student.

Perfect freedom of thought and expression.

Reason and experience the highest authority.

No discrimination made because of a pupil's ideas.

All narrow and sectarian ruts are carefully avoided.

The aim will be to make the pupils original thinkers.

Object—The aim of the school is to furnish an opportunity for a person of any age above childhood, and in any condition of life, to obtain by a fair amount of effort, and outlay, as much of a general and helpful education as two years' time and one's brain power will permit; also a chance to accompush this in a school where Spiritualism and mediumship are not ignored, nor a medium ridiculed and driven to hide the manifestation of his psychic powers.

Work—The school will be so conducted that it will have no attraction for idlers nor pleasure seekers, nor those who foolishly imagine that if they attend, the teachers can pump knowledge into their passive brains as water can be pumped into an empty pail.

The school is for those who are willing and expect to apply themselves to intellectual work.

Hence it is hoped and urged that all who attend will take the full two years' course, with no branch omitted; and it is especially urged that all who propose to become pupils be present and commence their study at the opening of the school in order to avoid the danger of finding themselves behind in the classes and becoming discouraged in the work.

Enslaving habits—It is believed by the instructors that no person, either as teacher or pupil, should remain a member of the school or in any way connected therewith who makes a practice of resorting to saloons or other disreputable places, hence they strongly and earnestly request that all who propose to enter the school, cast away and leave behind them any enslaving habit they may have acquired, such as the use of vulgarity, profanity, strong drinks, tobacco, opium or other injurious drugs.

By order of Board of Instructors.

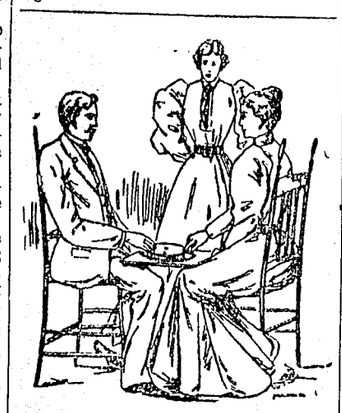
Banquet to Friends of Lake Helen.

A most charming little dinner was given at the Grand Hotel, Lily Dale, N. Y., July 26, by Mrs. M. H. Coburn, of Athens, N. Y., to a party of friends who had met at Lake Helen, Fla., the past winter, at the Southern Cassadaga Spiritualist camp.

It was a reunion of Lake Helen friends and was most enjoyable in that they little thought they should meet at Lily Dale this summer. The table was magnificently decorated with ferns and beautiful flowers, and the menu was most sumptuous.

The hostess was charmingly gowned, and entertained her happy guests in here own sweet way. The guests were as follows: J. Clegg Wright, Amelia, Ohio; P. B. Millspaugh, Anderson, Ind.; Mrs. M. S. Hardenburg, Lily Dale, N. Y.; Prof. A. B. Magoon, West Hanover, Mass.; Mrs. S. M. Sage, Lily Dale, N. Y.; Mrs. E. J. Huff, Lily Dale, N. Y.; Miss J. Lois Green, Daytona, Fla.; Miss Cora Tompkins, Lily Dale, N. Y.; C. R. Abbott, Jr., Ocala, Fla.; Mrs. M. A. Coburn, Athens, N. Y. X.

HAY FEVER AND ASTHMA CURED BY THE Kola Plant.



The Kola Plant.

A New and Positive Cure for HAY-FEVER and ASTHMA has been found in the Kola Plant, a rare botanic product of West African origin. So great are the powers of this New Remedy that in the short time since its discovery it has come into almost universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America for the cure of every form of Hay-Fever and Asthma. Its cures are really marvelous. Men, women and children who have been given up as incurable are being restored daily to perfect health by the use of Himalya. Thousands of letters attesting its wonderful cures have been written the importers, but limited space prevents a detailed list. Read what a few have to say, proving that Hay-Fever and Asthma can be cured:

Mr. J. B. Ayle, Estherville, Iowa, writes, Feb. 28th, 1902, that he was cured of Hay-Fever and Asthma after severe suffering for 28 years. Miss Eva Preston, Petersburg, Ind., writes March 8th, 1902, that she suffered untold misery for 18 years with Hay-Fever and Asthma. Is now completely cured, although her physician said that a cure was impossible in her case. Wm. Kuhler, Sr., Warrenton, Mo., writes Dec. 22nd, was cured of Hay-Fever and Asthma of five year's standing, and that his son was also cured after many years of similar suffering. Mr. J. W. Cully, No. 1159 W. Lafayette Ave., Jacksonville, Ill., writes March 10th, 1902: "I traveled a great deal for relief from Asthma; climate of Michigan and Minnesota gave temporary relief, but Himalya entirely cured me." Rev. J. W. Coombs, Martinsburg, W. Va., writes to the New York World, July 22nd, that it cured him of Asthma of 30 years' standing. Mrs. Emaline Bolton, No. 389 Conarroe St., Philadelphia, Pa., writes March 9th, 1902, was completely cured two years ago, and says Himalya is the only Asthma medicine that has merit, and she has tried them all. Mr. C. B. Slade, Los Angeles, Cal., writes March 8th, 1902, that Himalya saved his life. He told numbers of sufferers about his cure, and Himalya did not fail in a single case.

If you suffer from Hay-Fever and Asthma in any form, do not despair, but write at once to the Kola Importing Co., No. 1162 Broadway, New York City, N. Y., who in order to prove the power of this wonderful new botanic discovery will send you one Trial Case by mail, entirely Free. Remember it costs you absolutely nothing.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH —OR— DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant a pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Ora Wallard: Q. What is "Compound extract of Salyx," advertised as a preservative of fruits, thus avoiding the laborious process of canning?

A. There is no such substance as "salyx" known to chemists, and it is a trade name, thereby concealing the name or name of its ingredients. It is, however, probably, pure salicylic acid, a substance largely used as a preservative by jelly and pickle makers, and for canned meats, fresh meats, etc. There is no question as to its preservative qualities; it is a wonderful "embalming" fluid when dissolved. There are objections against its use which are quite serious; it is a poison, and there are laws against its being mixed with food products, making such an act a misdemeanor, punishable with heavy fines or imprisonment. The acid is such a good preservative, it protects food thus prepared against digestion.

In practice a small part of the commercial preserved fruits, meats, etc., so beautifully kept, are examined by the officers appointed for that duty. If all were, the larger half would be condemned and the vendors fined for flagrant breaking the laws regarding pure food. Embalmed fruit is no more healthful than embalmed beef.

J. H. Tuck: Q. (1) Do the Mormons still advocate polygamy? Is there cause for alarm at the spread of their doctrines?

(2) Is it possible for writing to be produced without pen or pencil by simple thought power?

A. (1) The better portions of the Mormons never advocated polygamy. It was an after consideration taken from the teachings of the Bible. Under the laws of the United States, which Utah has accepted, polygamy cannot exist openly. Yet there is no doubt but it is practiced by some of the more zealous. But it has no recognition and is doomed to disappear with the present generation. There is not the least danger of the spread of Mormonism in this country or among educated people.

(2) That writing can be produced by spirit power has been repeatedly proven, but thought is intangible, and to be felt must strike against another mind. There is thought transference, because there is another mind to receive. Thought is a complex series of waves, and which although potent when received by a responding mind, are not able to move a mote in the sunbeams.

Mrs. Olga Welling: Six years ago, under very trying circumstances, we had manifestations which gave us greatest consolation. We moved to another city, met opposition and they ceased three months ago. My eleven-year-old son suddenly departed this life. I never for a moment thought he was dying, and had but an hour to realize. Yet I would not disturb him, and without a murmur let him pass in peace. At the funeral I was suddenly controlled, saying to others not to sorrow, for he was in a better life. After this we had manifestations every day. A young girl was controlled, but now we receive lying and horrible messages. I am all at sea. I know not what to think or believe.

A. This is not a unique experience, but is most common, and if any evidence can prove the independent character of the manifestations and that they do not depend on the will or consciousness, or sub-consciousness of those who receive them, this ought to be convincing. That removal to a new and strange place where conditions were changed and few were met having sympathy and all more or less antagonistic, should so disturb the harmony as to prevent communications being received, would be almost a necessary consequence.

Again, while in a great majority of instances grief deadens the sensibility and closes the spiritual perceptions, there are cases where it intensifies and the departing spirit impresses itself. Such mediumship called out by the great tension of the nervous system, will disappear with the subsidence of grief.

The circle which follows is held at all times and without a fixed date with a promiscuous membership. It becomes an open door for any spirit, pleasing, to enter and communicate. Hence deception, falsehood. It is all in accordance with well-known spiritual laws, and to the student offers no objection, or cause of doubt.

B. F. Cummings: Q. Is there any truth in the legend of the "Ten Lost Tribes of Israel?". On what authority does the story rest, and who are their descendants?

A. The only authority, and absolutely the only mention of the "ten tribes" is the brief mention made in II. Kings 15:29, II. Kings 17:3. The king of Assyria, Tiglath-Pileser, in the eighth century B. C., carried the tribes into Northwestern Persia. That is the last and only historic mention of them. They were of about the same importance, and degree of civilization as the tribes of Mohawk Indians and their influence as slight on the current of history.

The effect of this legend on theological dogmatism has been more marked. The "ten tribes" have furnished an insoluble problem, a never-ending cause of disputation to those who have attempted to throw light on the dark passages of the Bible. Learned disquisitions have been written to show that the Afghans were descendants of these tribes. It was plausible, for it must have been near the territory and occupied by this people that the Assyrian king transported the rebels. The Afghans are Arabic in origin, and the best archeologists smile at the childishness of this theory. When it was found by early travelers that the Abyssinians were distinctly of the Jewish type and religion, it was claimed with great eclat that they surely were the descendants of the "lost tribes." No one would care to risk his reputation for mediocre mentality, by now setting up that claim. Then repeatedly has the origin of the American Indian been referred to these lost tribes. Even so far has mendacity gone as to claim that the roots of Indian words were found in the Hebrew! Perhaps it would be impossible to find languages more distinct than the agglutinative Indian and the barren Hebrew.

This legend of the "ten lost tribes" being ancestors of the red man, bore fruit in the Mormon bible and is responsible for the foundation of that church, of blended superstition, credulity, ignorance and rascality, in this era of intelligence.

The fact is that these wandering tribes or families, absolutely unknown to general history from their insignificance, were because of some offense, transplanted to a portion of Assyria where they could be better guarded in their marauding expeditions. They were nomadic, living in skin-covered tents, supported by their flocks and herds, and robbery. It was no hardship for them to go to new territory, where they could graze their herds on more luxuriant pastures than was afforded by the half-desert lands they occupied. Mingling with the hordes of surrounding people this comparative handful of nomads were lost by amalgamation. It must be borne in mind that the Assyrians were of the same type as the Jews and Arabs—Semitic—and hence there was no bar of race to prevent interblending.

Notes from Briggs Park.

The camp-meeting in session at Briggs Park is moving on in its usual harmonious manner, in spite of the many adverse conditions, in shape of thunder storms and mosquitoes, the latter a most trying pest.

Our secretary, Thomas J. Haynes, and his good wife Agnes are doing all they can to make the friends and mediums on the ground and the strangers who visit the camp feel that they are more than welcome.

The saddest event of this year's meeting was the death of Bro. E. E. Parker, of Fort Wayne, Ind. He had just arrived to fill an engagement, and his passing on was the result of accidental morphine poisoning.

His body was taken to his home by Mrs. Gerhing of Chicago, and Mrs. Blake of Grand Rapids. These good ladies conducted the funeral services at the home of the deceased, while Bro. D. A. Herrick, of Alliance, Ohio, (chairman of the camp), conducted a beautiful memorial service here last Thursday.

D. A. Herrick is filling the chair left vacant by E. E. Carpenter, business of a private nature calling Bro. Carpenter to his home in Detroit. We shall miss him and his good wife. But our friend from Ohio is a host in himself, and seemingly fits into every niche. One of the many good things which he has done was to surprise Bro. Haynes last Sunday by asking for a special collection to assist in defraying the expenses of the camp, which owing to adversities are many and hard to meet; he got a pleasing response to his appeal. However, he does not believe in asking others to give and not contribute himself; so he and Mrs. George Schumm, a very remarkable physical medium of Grand Rapids, tendered the management a benefit seance from which a goodly sum was realized. He takes the platform next week to fill the place left vacant by the transition of Bro. Parker; we know there is a treat in store for us.

We hear only words of praise and commendation for the speakers and mediums who have contributed by their work and presence to the attractions of the camp this year.

We would mention as first on the list, Mrs. Morrell, of Grand Rapids, a young worker, but who gives promise of one day standing at the head of the class of our inspired workers.

Mrs. Fuller and Mrs. Blake, both "home mediums," who have given remarkable tests from our platform.

Mrs. Gerhing, of Chicago, a lady well known for her slate writing and trumpet mediumship, has added her quota. Her daughter, Mrs. Harry More, wife of the speaker, has pleased all by her sweet singing.

Frank N. Foster is here with his camera that is sure to reproduce the faces of our spirit loved ones.

The Association gave one day to the State. At that time we had the pleasure of listening to Mrs. Augusta Ferris, Mrs. Fuller, W. O. Knowles and other home talent. The meeting was well attended, and the State Association realized a neat sum.

We see upon the grounds Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Klauser, of Indianapolis, who are doing good work; Mrs. L. De Loux, of Chicago, and Miss Mattie Woodbury, of Haslet Park. Mrs. Lole F. Prior, of Atlanta, Ga., accompanied by her daughter Leola, have been with us the past week.

Mrs. Prior is filling her engagement in her usual pleasing manner. Her lectures and spirit messages are always well received by our people, while Miss Prior has given us a very pleasing literary entertainment. Last Monday she was assisted by Mrs. T. J. Haynes and Miss Griffith. Mrs. and Miss Prior leave us to-morrow for Grand Ledge. We will miss them.

Last, but by no means least, we would mention the visit and work of H. D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A., who was with us two days. This was Bro. Barrett's first visit to our camp. We trust, however, it will not be the last, for he seems to have imparted some of his inspiration and enthusiasm to us, by his instructive and able addresses. May Bro. Barrett go on with the good work which he is doing.

Next Monday has been set apart as N. S. A. day.

We have two weeks more of camp, and know they will be weeks of instruction and pleasure.

BOOK REVIEW.

The Christians' Hell and Infant Damnation. An Essay Showing that Hell Is Being Constantly Modified and Made More Comfortable. By J. M. Peebles, M. D., M. A.

Dr. Peebles' little brochure is rather warm reading for this hot weather, and we advise its readers to take a good cooling and soothing draught of pure Spiritualism after passing through the flaming fires of hell, as literally taken from orthodox creeds, sermons, and writings.

It is a good and handy work for reference, and for use as occasion may seem to demand.

No Spiritualist can read it without loving Spiritualism more, and orthodoxy less; and it would seem that no orthodox person could read it without loving orthodoxy less and, at least, not hating Spiritualism more.

Summerland Beach Camp, O.

This camp opened Sunday, July 27. It is located one-half mile east of Millersport, Ohio, at the head of Buckeye Lake, Fairfield county, and is a most beautiful and picturesque country, just the place to receive quiet rest from busy city life and anxiety. The meeting opened Sunday with an appreciative audience. Bro. S. J. Woolley, president of the camp association, delivered the opening address of welcome. Frank T. Ripley gave spirit messages, and Mrs. L. A. Grove, a worker in the camp for the past six years, also greeted the audience and welcomed them. Mrs. Hattie Gillette Webster rendered one of her original poems, entitled "True Religion," and A. P. Conant addressed the audience and propounded the Spiritual philosophy and phenomena from a biblical standpoint.

This camp will hold three meetings each day, Monday excepted, until August 18. It is the purpose of the officers and members of this association to build up a camp-meeting place that will be a Mecca for Spiritualism. Its permanency is a fixed fact, and the location and hotel accommodations are first-class. Fishing, boating and other attractions make it a desirable place to visit.

Lake Brady Camp.

The second Sunday of Lake Brady Camp opened with threatening weather, but notwithstanding its inclemency quite a number came from surrounding towns to listen to Mrs. Amanda L. Coffman, of Grand Rapids, Mich., the speaker of the day. She is an interesting talker and held the attention of her audience throughout. Her messages were varied and of interest to all, and recognized by the recipients as proof that their spirit friends were also present.

In the evening Mrs. Coffman and Charlie Barnes held a trumpet seance in Mr. A. G. Keck's parlor, which was a complete success and enjoyed by all present.

On Tuesday evening Mrs. Coffman held a trumpet seance for the campers, which was largely attended and gave complete satisfaction. On Wednesday evening the ladies held a lawn fete; ice cream and cake were served, and an entertainment by local talent was given, the proceeds being for the benefit of the camp. MARY L. BETTES.

Lily Dale Camp Notes.

Notwithstanding the storms which have swept over our beautiful Dale, and the havoc to the railroads and the country at large, the spirit of progress is still undaunted and finds a grand field of expression here, where are congregated so many who are come to learn of the philosophy of life in its highest and best as far as human intellect can explore. The audiences have been large and attentive to the teachings given by our speakers, Mrs. Twing, Miss Harlow, and Professors Lockwood and Wright. The greatest enthusiasm prevails over the class lectures given by these gentlemen, showing unmistakable proof of their value.

Tuesday, July 22, Mrs. Richmond was the speaker of the afternoon, and gave an interesting address from the subject, "When Came I? Whither Am I Going?" Mrs. Richmond is conducting an interesting class on the subject, "The New Psychology."

Wednesday afternoon, Rev. F. A. Wiggin made his first appearance before a Lily Dale audience. His address was forceful, and his tests which followed were correct, and promptly responded to. Mr. Wiggin has made a favorable impression here.

Thursday afternoon Miss Harlow gave her last lecture. If applause speaks for anything, Miss Harlow won the audiences at each lecture. Thursday evening, a reception was tendered to Miss Harlow and Mrs. Twing, at the auditorium, by the Willing Workers, which was largely attended, and a very enjoyable season it was to all. The society of Willing Workers has been very busy under Mrs. Twing's direction since her coming, and we hope to continue the good work for the benefit of the C. L. F. A., of which it is auxiliary.

The lyceum is making good progress, with a good corps of teachers under Mr. Van Buskirk's leadership.

All around, Lily Dale is pronounced by all the banner camp.

MARY WEBB-BAKER.

Marshalltown Camp, Iowa.

The ninth annual camp-meeting of the Central Iowa Spiritualists' Association, which opens at Marshalltown, Iowa, August 24, and closes September 14, bids fair to be the largest, best and finest camp-meeting that this association has ever experienced. Certain it is that no pains or expense has been spared in the selection of speakers and mediums to instruct and entertain the campers and the general public; a special effort being made to provide such as will be of the greatest interest and most convincing to the unbelievers and investigators. It is also certain that no camp in the West will have a better assortment of talent in every line or a better program from beginning to end.

Situated as we are and drawing largely from the city, it is necessary to cut out nearly all such things as dances and entertainments and stick to good solid business, hence the time is crowded full of the finest lectures, test seances, etc., that any one could wish.

The music committee say they have secured a good choir; and arrangements have been made with the famous Forty-ninth Regiment Band for Sunday concerts.

Among the speakers and mediums who have been engaged and who have promised to attend may be mentioned: Henry J. Moore, of Chicago, who will open the camp and deliver several lectures the first week; Jennie Hagan Brown, of Fort Worth, Texas, who will be present from August 29 to September 7, inclusive; Mrs. Marian Carpenter, of Detroit, who is engaged for the last half; Maggie Waite, of Chicago, present the first half; Max Hoffman, present the last ten days; Mr. E. E. Carpenter, of Detroit, present the last half; Mrs. Eva McCoy of Marshalltown, Mrs. A. L. Allbright of Philadelphia, Mrs. S. F. DeWolf of Chicago, and Mrs. C. B. Bliss of Boston, who will be present during the entire time.

The many Iowa friends of Mr. and Mrs. M. Buchanan will also be pleased to learn that they will be here the full time.

We are in correspondence with the Western Passenger Association and will doubtless have railroad rates on the certificate plan from all points in Iowa, and perhaps extending farther.

The camp ground is in a beautiful grove, on the car line, and surrounded on all sides by residences, in which, if preferred, accommodations may be secured.

Lily Dale Camp.

Sunday was an auspicious day at Lily Dale. The weather being fine, put a smile on the face of nature and a counterpart smile was reflected from the faces of the crowds of people who were congregated here, having taken advantage of the excursion trains which will be run every Sunday from Buffalo and points South and West.

Mrs. Richmond gave one of her most interesting lectures Sunday forenoon. Rev. Wiggin in the afternoon spoke to a crowded audience, following his lecture with tests, all of which were promptly acknowledged. Bro. Grimshaw presides at the meetings with dignity and acceptability. We predict for Bro. Grimshaw a future of great usefulness, and what greater career can we ask than to be of use to the great world of humanity, to fill a place no one else can fill, to do a work no one else can do—and do that work well. This is what is needed—practical workers.

Monday forenoon Hon. A. B. Richmond gave an address on Spiritualism and how he became educated out of Methodism and Materialism into the new gospel. Monday afternoon J. Clegg Wright gave his class lecture, pronounced to be one of his most masterly efforts. At three in the afternoon the funeral services were conducted by Lyman C. Howe over the remains of Mrs. Amy Woods—one of Lily Dale's old-time and honored cottagers; a steadfast Spiritualist, she passed to her spirit home from the earth home she loved most.

Tuesday forenoon Prof. Lockwood's class lecture occupied the time and it is about evenly balanced between the Professor and Mr. Wright as to the enthusiasm prevailing over their work.

In the afternoon Mr. Wright, under a powerful control, lectured upon the subject, "Spiritualism and the Extension of Empire." He held his audience with a power irresistible, and a storm of applause greeted him at the close.

In the evening there was a concert in the auditorium, given by the well-known singer, H. Ruthven MacDonald, assisted by Miss Stratton Harrison, violinist.

The dances are well patronized, and young and old attend, charmed by the fine music rendered by the orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Berkell.

Among the notable arrivals this week are A. H. Daily and wife, New York; J. W. and A. J. Underhill, Canton, Ohio; E. Walker, Erie, Pa.; Wm. O. Wilson, Chicago; F. W. Hyde, Jamestown, N. Y.; H. Ruthven MacDonald and wife, and Miss J. S. Harrison, Toronto, Canada; Mrs. S. Ramsey, Columbus, Ohio; Mrs. M. Ganson Ryley, Boston, Mass.; Stanley H. Warren, Boston; Mrs. F. A. Koehler, Chicago; Eber Bond, and Dr. Sherman, Willoughby, Ohio.

Grand Ledge Camp, Mich.

The eighth annual assembly of the Grand Ledge camp opened Sunday, July 25, and notwithstanding the rain, half a hundred people more than last year passed through the gates.

George H. Brooks will arrive August 2 and begin his week's engagement, and Farmer Riley is expected the last week of camp.

Mrs. A. E. Sheets is chairwoman again this year, and we are glad to inform her many friends that her health is much better than last season.

Mrs. C. E. Huhn, of Saranac will take possession of her fine new cottage this week.

Mr. A. E. Winans is with us, and other mediums are arriving daily.

Boating and fishing are good this year.

Tuesday evening, Miss Leola Prior, of Atlanta, Ga., assisted by the campers, gave a very fine literary and musical entertainment in the camp auditorium. Miss Prior is the daughter of Mrs. Loe Prior, who has been our speaker the past week, and a very gifted reader. LAURA MATLOCK, Secretary.

Ottawa Camp, Kansas.

Ottawa is situated on the Missouri Pacific and Santa Fe R. R., is about 45 miles southeast of Topeka, Kans., and 60 miles southwest of Kansas City.

Forest Park, in which our meetings are held, is universally admitted to be one of the finest parks in the state. The park comprises about one hundred acres; its towering elms, its magnificent walnuts, oaks, hackberry and hickorys interspersed with its beautiful gravel walks, beautiful lawns, fish ponds and flowers, also the grand old Marias des Cygnes river on the south of the park, all go to make it "a thing of beauty and a joy forever." This is where the famous Chautauqua Assembly has been held for the last 24 years.

We have unlimited possession of all the grounds and buildings. We are well provided with buildings, cots and bedding. We can care for all who may wish to come. We will have a dining-hall on the grounds, where good meals will be furnished for 15 cents, also cot and bedding in a good room for 15 cents per night, thus making it one of the cheapest camps in the United States.

Bring tents if you wish, but we have plenty without them.

While we have the best of speakers and mediums, there will be no admission to the grounds or lectures, our expenses being met by voluntary contributions. We have two good hotels near by, and those who wish private rooms can be accommodated in private family. Our meetings increase in interest year by year.

At our first meeting we were greeted by about 40 and at last by 1,500, and that on Sunday evening when all the churches were open.

The citizens of the town and the press treat us with the utmost courtesy, and seem to welcome our return from year to year. We expect materializing, trance, clairvoyant, psychometric and independent slate-writing mediums on the grounds, all of whom are tried and true, but this society will not hold itself responsible for traveling fakes and mediums of whom they know nothing of their former reputation, and we will be the first to expose their nefarious practices if needs be.

Arrangements are being made for reduced railroad rates, of which due notice will be given.

In conclusion, welcome we bid you welcome to our camp. Come and bring your friends and neighbors, have a good time where we can hold sweet communion with loved ones gone before. Come to a camp-meeting where

It's free from care and toil and strife;
It's just the place to bring your wife;
Everything is pure and nice—
You'll think you're landed in paradise.

For further information and programs, address Howard Henderson, Lawrence, Kans., or the secretary, Jacob Hey, Overbrook, Kans. Ezra Carpenter, Wellsville, Kans., is superintendent of the grounds. COR.

Maple Dell Camp, O.

The National Spiritual and Religious Association opened its fourteenth annual session on July 27, 1902. The attendance was much larger than was expected, all things considered.

The meeting was called to order by the president, who made a clear and distinct statement of the origin, progress and present development of the association, showing that it had been a success. He said that if no more sessions were ever held, Maple Dell would show a record where pure Spiritualism was paramount.

M. O. Danforth, chairman, delivered the address of welcome in his genial, happy style, which made the audience harmonious and receptive.

2 p. m., music. Invocation by A. W. Wadsworth, followed by an able address from Miss Mabel Shively. Subject, "What is Spiritualism?" from the young people's standpoint, showing that our descendants are natural-born Spiritualists, and that Spiritualism in the future is to be represented by a more scholarly class, and by a higher standard of ethics.

Miss Jessie Howk made an earnest plea for the Children's Progressive Lyceum. It was extempore, and proved to be one of the finest addresses in the interest of the young people's unfoldment that was ever made upon our rostrum. She was followed by Mrs. Bessie Woodard, who is an inspirational speaker and message medium. She did exceedingly well.

Mr. Wadsworth, president of the Ohio State Spiritual Association, then gave a very interesting and instructive talk, with good advice to all. So with delightful music, pleasant weather and harmonious surroundings closed the opening day at Maple Dell.

LUCY KING, Cor. Sec.

Mantua Camp, O.

I feel like telling you of the harmony so fully expressed here. When the heavenly ruler sends us sunshine we make hay in our camp work. It would surprise you to see the white-haired workers following the young, giving them advice and strength. Our loved president, Dr. King, has a happy smile and cheerful word for all. He is anxious to have the young mediums unfold and develop so that there may be some one to take the place of himself and his honored wife who have been so faithful to the work. I tell you there is no better and more lovely spiritual home than here at Mantua; so grand for the young mediums to rise in their work, and be ordained and become actively identified with this camp, and have a voice in the board meetings and become stockholders, and little by little build a little cottage and have it for a resting place for their families and themselves.

The children should grow up with a spiritual influence. Let them be trained in the lyceum. This camp opened with a dance. I never saw young people enjoy themselves better. One of the beauties of the dance was a practice by the prompter singing his changes; not one felt tired or out of sorts the next day. The Lyceum has begun its work; also Dr. King in his psychic lessons. To-morrow the Grange is entertained. E. A. RATHBUN.

LITTLE FOOL.

You are living to-day in Heaven,
Earth's yesterdays not long past;
I wonder, sometimes, if you keep your pace,
And your life goes wild and fast.
You never were level of head, dear;
You didn't seem built that way,
Though you did know right from wrong sometimes,
But you often went astray.

Ah! you sweet little fool, we loved you,
And love you the same to-day
As when you were flesh-clad, here in our midst,
Distracting us every way!
We felt you would get through life early,
For no one could "slow you up;"
You held the opinion you knew so much,
You could manage life's full cup.

But ah, little fool, you upset it!
You wasted its contents sweet,
And the Dresden china which held the draught
Alas, lay spoiled at our feet.
You'd toyed with the hollest feelings
And did not know what they were.
You thought, little fool, it was cunning to be
A nettle, a thorn, a burr!

And the great heart where you abode, dear,
Who knew what you did not know,
And knew that you never could understand,
He smiled when you fed him woe!—
Was never unkind, nor resented,
But took you for what you were:—
And he tried to steady your wayward feet,
But you ever would demur.

At last when the end of it all came,
And the last cute "turn" was done,
You had had your way to the flowery close,
The flirting, the tears, the fun;
Then, poor little fool, we pitied you,
And wished you had had more sense;—
Enough to have known that the pace you went
Was a bankrupting expense.

You are living to-day in Heaven,
Dear fool, were you leaning out
Last evening to list to a wedding march?
"Yes?" "What was it all about?"
The great heart you had so agonized,
Little fool, when it held you dear,
Has met with its peer, and the two are wed.
You will pay your fool-tax there.

EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

Berlin Heights, Ohio.

Mystification by The Magazine of Mysteries.

The Magazine of Mysteries says: "It is hard for him who knows about life beyond this earth-experience, to demonstrate his knowledge to the satisfaction of one who does not know. There are pleasures and sorrows in the spirit world, but only peace and joy in the angel world. The mystics will understand this paragraph."

In the first paragraph the writer emphasizes "knows" concerning the life beyond, acknowledging the possibility of knowing about life beyond the earth. In the second he makes a distinction between the spirit and angel world, showing conclusively that he for one does not know anything about it. That "the mystics will understand this paragraph" undoubtedly means what the writer understands about it—nothing.

BEYOND THE VAIL
A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,

(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. "THE UNKNOWN"
—BY—
CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. WHY BE SICK?

Dr. J. M. Peebles the Famous Physician and Scientist Has Perfected a System of Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Sufferer.

Read His Valuable Book, "A Message of Hope"—It will Explain to You this Wonderful Treatment and Tell You How You Can be Healed.

Why will you continue to suffer when there is a treatment at hand that will cure you? Dr. Peebles and his associates, all physicians of wide experience and reputation, have perfected a system of treatment that promises health and strength to all.

J. M. Peebles, A.M., M. D., Ph. D.

Many of their cures seem almost like miracles, for hundreds of those restored had traveled far and wide, trying this doctor and that, without getting any relief and were about to give up in despair when they began the treatment of Dr. Peebles.

They are able to do such wonderful cures because they work in harmony with nature, and employ her mighty healing forces in connection with mild, scientifically prepared medicinal remedies. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the depleted system, enriches the blood, improves digestion and assimilation, gives strength and tone to weakened nerves and muscles, and permanently repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing thousands of the sick to rejoice at being healed.

Why don't you sit down, at once, and write the doctors a plain, truthful letter as to your condition as you see it? If you will do this, they will carefully examine your case and send you a full diagnosis of your condition, and tell you truthfully whether or not they can cure you. This will cost you nothing, and if they find they can cure you, they will make their charges so small that anyone can afford the treatment.

If you are sick, write them at once for their full diagnosis and professional advice which will be sent without charge, together with their wonderful book, "A Message of Hope," which will explain fully this grand system of treatment and give you information that will brighten the remainder of your life. Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

SERMONS CHANGING.

Excerpts That Show the Tendency of the Pulpit.

The clergy are certainly progressing and are becoming more sensible in their deductions and presentations of living truths instead of dead superstitions. Notice the following from their Sunday sermons:

LOVE FOR OUR NEIGHBOR.

Odd Fellows and Rebekah lodges of the South Side attended Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church and heard a special sermon by the Rev. Clarence Abel. With members of fraternal orders for auditors the pastor took "Friendship" for his topic.

"He gets most out of life who loves most," said the minister. "Alone we are but fragmentary parts of a whole life. The soul finds its consolation only through its relationships with other souls. Hence friendship is one of life's necessities. A self-centered life, such as many are to-day leading, defrauds our own souls. The key that locks others out locks ourselves in.

"No human friendship entirely comes up to the beautiful ideal. But the dream is one that the world has ever cherished. The persistency of the ideal is token that the reality was to come. So all beautiful human friendships were but unconscious prophecies of the coming of him who would make the ideal and the real join hands, and so grow into the possibility of a divine life for all.

"The truest conception of religion is, not faith in a creed, but loyalty to a person. The religion of Christ is not at heart a matter of dogma, but of relationship. Therefore is the religion of Christ possible to even the humblest and most ignorant. Not all can be learned in theology, but all can learn love. Not all can comprehend the intricacies of doctrine, but all can enter into the personal relation of friendship.

"A man can never reach any higher up to God than he reaches out toward humanity. There is no discovery of a divine Father without at the same time a discovery of human brethren. No friendship has done its full work for us until it has reached the supreme satisfaction of spiritual communion; no religion has done its full work for us until it has broadened out into a social force."

WASTE TIME ON MYSTERIES.

Men and women spend too much time on mysteries and "theologies" and too little on the simple matters of life and duty, was a statement made by Prof. Nathaniel Butler, of the University of Chicago, speaking in the Plymouth Congregational Church.

"The world would doubtless have been much happier, and would be much happier to-day," he continued, "if much of the time spent in formulating divine truth had been spent in its direct application to life. While we press out into the unknown and seek to solve the mysteries we should never let the unexplained stand in the way of our thorough application of the things we do know and can use.

"In agriculture and in science we apply the knowledge that we have, while in matters of faith we are too apt to let the mysterious stand in the way of our living in peace and strength, enjoying a steadfast hope and vigorous life and ever increasing usefulness."

DESTINY LINKED WITH DESIRE.

In a sermon at the Wesley Methodist Episcopal Church the Rev. Polemus H. Swift said life followed the desires of the heart.

"The man who loves poetry," he continued, "will live in the realm of the poet. The man who loves art will surround himself with the grandest works of the masters as far as he is able to do so. The man who loves purity will associate with the pure in heart and character. All of this makes it certain that there is only one way to secure a change of life and that is by securing a change of heart.

"Destiny is linked with desire. Character flows out of the fountains of choice. The man who is selfish in the deepest depths of his nature cannot be generous. Philanthropy does not come out of hatred. Out of the heart are the issues of life. If you would do right you must be right."

NATURE, NOT DRUGS, THE CURE.

"It is nature that usually cures and the doctor or the Christian Scientist pockets the fee. Every doctor will agree that nineteen out of twenty acute diseases will get well anyhow whether medicine is taken or not."

These statements were made by the Rev. Camden M. Cobern in a sermon at St. James' Methodist Episcopal Church. But Dr. Cobern did not decry medicines. On the other hand, he defended their use, and criticised the attitude of faith curists in condemning drugs.

RICH AND POOR FOR PREACHERS

"There are only two kinds of people that ought to preach the gospel—those who are independently rich and those who are independently poor," said the Rev. Frank Crane at the University of Chicago. "As soon as a preacher begins to want what is in the pockets of his hearers, there is a seed of weakness in his message.

"Every real Christian desires to prove his religion, to make other people believe the truth he has learned. Now you are not going to prove the truth of Christianity to a living soul by quoting scripture. Neither are you going to convert people by miracles. This is not the day for miracles. If I should see somebody come along and root up trees and cast mountains into the sea, it wouldn't convince me of anything. I would simply think I wasn't onto his system.

"The trouble with the church to-day is that people try to quote scripture, to work miracles, to deal in logic chopping, when what we want is samples—samples of what religion can do—and we are scarce of them. Who cares what church you belong to, what is your creed, what is your social standing? Is there a force in you that makes you do things that are Christlike? If not, you had better keep still."

HEAVEN AND HELL CONDITIONS.

The old heaven and hell of our childhood's dreams, said the Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford, are no longer working factors in determining human conduct. He added that they were being replaced by a conviction that they are conditions and not places. He was speaking in Memorial Unitarian Chapel.

"Hell and heaven," he continued, "depend on no ecclesiastical or theological jugglery. The quiet judgment of the process of the universe cannot be cheated or cajoled. What you become is your absolutely certain reward or your inexorable penalty, and both depend on what you yield yourself to hour by hour.

"Besides this we are learning that neither depend on external circumstances half as much as we suppose. The cards that are dealt to us in the game of life are mostly beyond our ordering. But if we play for the game itself it does not much matter. We may not like the cards, but we can play well all the same. We may not have the sugar plum heaven of the narrow minded, but we can win heaven, we shall inevitably win it, if we only set ourselves to making the man in us master of fate and turning even the hardest things into strength."

WANTS A CONSISTENT CHURCH.

Consistency in the church was declared to be an essential by the Rev. Pearse Pinch, in a sermon at the Forrestville Congregational Church. He said the church was here to cultivate sainthood, and should have a great deal of saintliness in its methods.

"We believe the risen Christ is doing a work of great redemption in the world," he said. "In that belief we send missionaries to negroes in Africa, and call the same people 'niggers,' and abuse them in America. We expect to live in heaven and at the same time grow to the earth.

"Seeking the things above does not mean neglecting the things below. It means improving the earth with heavenly qualities. To bring the ideals of heaven down into the worldly life is the great business to which we are called."

BULL FIGHTS.

Brutal Encounters Between Men.

To the Editor:—Within the past two weeks two topics have been uppermost in the newspapers and among the people in this part of California. One was the proposed bull-fight at Point Richmond, which brought out cyclones of indignation. The other was the fight between Jeffries and Fitzsimmons. The former was prevented by the interference of the railroad officials and others. The latter was discussed on the trains, boats and streets—everywhere. Eight thousand people attended the bloody man-fight. Tickets for box-seats sold for $20. Mayor Schmitz and Samuel Gompers were there. Twelve or fifteen women were present. The papers say when "Jeffries was cut into ribbons and was a mass of blood and dirt, the crowd yelled with delight." Will you, Mr. Editor, allow me to moralize a bit touching these subjects?

What I want to know is which is the most demoralizing, a bull-fight or a man-fight? Why should one be prevented and the other allowed, and be attended by 8,000 people?

Writers on heredity say that the witnessing and enjoyment of scenes of brutality create within us influences that are transmitted to our unborn children.

Jesse Pomeroy of Boston is serving a life sentence for cutting the throat of his school companion. All through his childhood he took pleasure in cutting the throats of cats, and dogs, and other animals. The business of his father was to cut the throats of hogs in a pork-packing establishment.

In England butchers are not allowed to sit as jurors in cases where the prisoner is being tried for a capital offense.

What kind of children do the men expect to have who "howl with delight" when they see a man with a broken nose, his face cut into ribbons and he a mass of blood?

Bull-fights are bad, are brutal, are productive of demoralization, brutality and crime. Man fights are worse than animal fights. Animals don't know any better. Men should know better.

If I were a practicing lawyer, as I was once, and I were counsel for a man being tried for his life, I would object to any man sitting on the jury who attended a prize fight and "howled with delight" at the sight of blood and brutality.

If I had a daughter I would use every persuasion to prevent her from marrying such a young man.

If I were judge of a court I would grant any woman a divorce from a husband who paid an admission fee to a brutal fight and who "yelled with delight" at witnessing two brutal men pounding each other into a jelly. So long as we have thousands of men who keenly enjoy bull-fights and man-fights and are delighted at seeing brutality, we will have Romers beating their children and finding jurymen to justify them, brutes in human form whipping their wives, and all sorts of brutality and crime.

The girl who marries a man that delights in seeing animals or humans beaten, need not be disappointed if her husband beats her. She may reasonably expect that her children will inherit from such a father a cruel, brutal nature.

I am now and have long been a persistent defender of the working men and the labor unions, but I blush to think that Samuel Gompers and Mayor Schmitz occupied prominent seats at that exhibition of savage brutality.

Are They Not Anti-Christians?

I believe every one familiar with the sayings of Jesus of Nazareth feels due respect for his teachings and character. His command that ye love one another is certainly very fine. Also the one to abide in him and he in us. For unless the branch abide in the vine it can bear no fruit. He also said, "Come and let us reason together. Though your sins are as crimson I will make them white as wool. Though they are as scarlet I will make them white as snow." He no doubt realized their diversity of opinions and by reasoning with him they could harmonize their conflicting opinions and promote brotherly love. He said to his disciples, "Go ye into all the world and preach my gospel. And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. And these signs shall follow them that believe: In my name they shall cast out devils. They shall speak with new tongues. They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them. They shall lay their hands on the sick, and the sick shall recover." That whatsoever they saw him do should they do also; and even greater things than they saw him do, should they do. He told them to ask and they should receive; to seek and they should find; to knock and it should be opened unto them. That where two or three of them should be gathered together in his name there he would be with them in their midst. That if they should ask for anything, it should be given them of the father.

Truly it would seem that any one not idiotic could comprehend Christ's instructions to his disciples. Do the clergy or their converts in the present age manifest those signs that Jesus said should follow them that believe? Do they cast out devils? Do they speak with new tongues? Do they take up serpents, or drink any deadly thing, feeling that it will not hurt them? Do they lay their hands on the sick and the sick recover?

Did they not only gather by twos and threes, but by thousands, and importune the throne of grace to save President Garfield, Queen Victoria, President McKinley, and others? Were the righteous amid their praying hosts, whom Jesus said would keep his commandments if they loved him? If not, what assurance had the self-constituted righteous that their prayers would ever reach the throne of grace? We learn in Matthew 10:8 that Jesus told his twelve disciples to heal the sick and the lepers and to cast out devils. "Freely ye have received, freely give." James 5:14, "If there are any among you sick, let them call on the elders and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord."

If Paul and the apostles could heal the sick and cast out devils, the clergy of the present day can do so if they have the faith and are disposed to. And my prayer is that their God of Israel will show them the folly of their duplicity in departing from the faith once delivered to the saints, and for teaching for doctrines the traditions of men. If the clergy would stop grieving and praying for sinners outside of the church, and them they meet by the way healing the sick and casting out devils and forbid them not, because they follow not them, they would manifest more wisdom and in time become more spiritual, humane and Godlike. The clergy do not seem to realize that the ding-dong of sounding brass and tinkling cymbals Sunday after Sunday has become monotonous. And hunting for grapes on thorns and for figs on thistles makes spiritual dyspeptics. Surely where there is no vision the people perish for the want of spiritual food. The people are studying the higher criticism as they find it in harmony with science and with the spiritual philosophy as taught and practiced by Jesus in healing the sick and in casting out devils. Yes, if you love me you will keep my commandments, and your reasonable prayers will be answered.

INTELLIGENT DOGS.

They Are Entitled to Immortality.

New York has a talking dog!

He is neither a subject of hypnotism nor one of those strangely human creatures which believers in the transmigration of the soul might suppose possessed by the spirit of some dear friend. He is an eminently normal dog, with all his canine attributes fully developed, and, as he only laid puppyhood aside with the celebration of his first birthday last Friday, has still the playful habits that appertain to extreme youth.

Petit talks because he cannot help it, and into his limited vocabulary puts more meaning than all the wordy eloquence of half a hundred orators. He does not concern himself with the parts of speech, but he has grasped the three cardinal principles of existence—he knows what he wants, knows how to ask for it, and never gives up till he gets it.

Petit is an English greyhound and a seventh son. To the latter fact he ascribes his unusual gifts, though he is properly modest in their exploitation, for he is a devoted brother. He is the property of Mrs. C. S. Blum, and first saw the light in the basement of No. 3 Abingdon square, one of the old-fashioned houses that front that quaint oasis in the desert of streets in old New York. His mother, Daisy, is a lady of high degree, and his father, Dewey, boasts a lengthy pedigree to prove his worth.

The dominance of the seven in the fate of the dogs is remarkable. Daisy's seven children were born June 27, 1901. One died seven days later. On the 27th of July they opened their eyes. One was given away, two were later poisoned through malice and three brothers alone remain. These are Sir James, Collaret (so-called because he came into the world with a complete white collar joined by a V at the back of the neck) and Petit, the last and smallest of the litter.

Her stalwart sons, as clean limbed and handsome a trio as is to be found in the country, are taller than their mild-eyed mother. Collaret and Sir James mingle white generously with their splendid gray coats on breast and legs, but Petit has only four tiny white socks and a touch of white on the end of his tail. They have been cared for like babies, and the constant reiteration from Mrs. Blum that "Mamma" would do this or that is probably largely responsible for Petit's debut as a speech-maker. One evening when his brothers had gone for a walk and I had exhausted all expressions of loneliness, he laid his pointed nose between his paws and gave vent to a loud wail of "Mamma!" that would have melted a heart of stone. The effect was instantaneous. Petit was caressed and taken out to join the others.

He remembered the lesson, and now when all else fails Petit's cry of "Mamma" informs Mrs. Blum that her immediate presence is required. His one other word is "es'm," and when, after some persuasion, he condescended to show off his accomplishments for a World reporter yesterday, both words came forth in a voice and accent so absurdly childish as to be hardly distinguishable from a human tone. His intelligence is unfailing, and Petit brings out his two remarks with an aptness that is something uncanny.

The shapely greyhound has as well a peculiar degree of magnetic force. Held in the arms he is said to have a soothing effect on tired nerves, and more than one of Mrs. Blum's friends claim for him the power to banish headache.

Collaret very early in life betrayed a love of music. To the accompaniment of banjo or guitar he will sing in his own fashion, raising or lowering his voice as the music grows louder or softer. The three are as near in affection as the Three Musketeers. Each boasts on his left forefoot a complete "luck" horseshoe and relies on his fleetness to distance all enemies.

By unanimous vote of humanity, these dogs will be regarded as worthy of immortality.

A Noble Worker.

I desire through the columns of your valuable paper to say a few words in regard to the great work which Mrs. Clara Ferris is doing for the cause of Spiritualism.

Mrs. Ferris is a born teacher and a powerful medium. She forms her classes, grades them so as to get the harmonious elements together, then quietly sits with her pupils and unfolds to them the great truths, in a very entertaining manner, giving from time to time such words of cheer and comfort as may come for any member of the class. At any and all sittings, each pupil is requested to suggest topics to be taken up, and all questions are answered in such a clear and comprehensive way, that they are thoroughly understood by the pupils. She teaches the theory, and then practically demonstrates what she has taught, with examples from the great storehouse of her own experience. She is ever ready to meet any question which is presented, either in the class room, in public meetings, or in private sittings. Her command of language is excellent, she is a logician and an orator as well as a scholar.

Mrs. Ferris has in view the founding of a school for teaching mental science or Spiritualism, or whatever name it may be called, in all its purity and simplicity. She believes that a school founded upon the great principles which underlie Spiritualism, will produce a concord, first with one's own self, and then with all mankind. She believes that the knowledge of Spiritualism is the key which unlocks the mysteries which have surrounded all religious and superstitious beliefs in all the ages that are past, and in the present, furnishes evidence, not theory, to prove the truth of its teachings.

She believes that such a school will command the respect and loyal support, not only of the believers of Spiritualism, but of others. She believes that in such a school it should be the aim to get the children in and teach them these great truths, before their little minds become polarized, and filled with all sorts of superstitious beliefs. That their little minds are fertile soil in which to plant the seeds of truth, or error, and that the first sown will be the most difficult to eradicate.

I have seen her teach children, and was not only amazed at the readiness with which they grasp these grand truths, but the undoubted proof which they exhibited of what they saw and heard. One of the most striking examples is my own little girl, 11 years old, who has been brought up in the orthodox faith, been a faithful attendant of Sunday-school and church, was placed in Mrs. Ferris' class. She seemed very much interested from the start. On the evening when she took her third lesson (the lesson was taken in the morning), she asked me to allow her to hold a little family circle. She being a child, to gratify her childish whim, as I supposed, said, all right, we will have a circle. She arranged the chairs to suit herself, and her little brother and myself sat with her in the circle. We had been sitting but a few minutes when she spoke up and said: "Somebody is coming, somebody is coming that you like to see." I said, who is it? She said, "Little Hellen, little Edna, little Charlie and Mary Rogers. They are all coming up a great wide road. Oh, the road is so wide. They are coming, coming, here they are, do you want to talk to them?" I said yes, and began to ask questions and talk to them, through her.

Of these children two were her little sisters, her little brother and a neighbor girl who was a playmate. Little Hellen and Mary Rogers were fast friends, and passed out close together, little Hellen first. I was present when little Mary, about three and a half years old, died. She had been unconscious for some time. She called little Hellen Hedder, when they were at play, and just before she passed out, having lain in a stupor for some time, she clapped her little hands and shouted, "Oh, Hedder! Oh, Hedder!" and sank back upon her pillow and was gone. This group always comes together.

The next one that came at this same sitting was an old school friend of mine, Will Case, who passed out many years ago. She told me many things about him that I know she did not know about. Then a great uncle and aunt of mine, that have been dead for about twenty years and of whom she knew nothing. She described them perfectly and answered questions and told me things that I had forgotten until they were brought up to my mind. Then an uncle came who has been gone many years, and still another uncle, her grandfather, grandmother, my brother who has been dead about fifteen years, and a young lady that she described and in every way tried to make me recognize, but I could not place her; the next evening she came again and still I could not place her, and the next evening she gave her name, Mollie Wright. As soon as I heard the name, it came to me like a flash. She had been dead at least twenty-five years. I knew her very well. She was a neighbor girl, and it seemed strange to me that I should be so dumb. That evening nineteen spirits visited and talked with me through my little daughter, and I recognized them all but one that evening, and the third day after she gave me her name and some additional evidence.

Up to that time I had felt that there was some mystery about Spiritualism, but that there might be some trickery or fraud about it, but when my own little girl, sitting at my own fireside, several miles away from her teacher, brought me the evidence so clear and convincing, I had to yield, and am now as confirmed in that belief as any of the people whom I used to call cranks, and pity them for having so little sense. If you wish to attract the older people, get the children interested, and instructed, and the older ones will learn from them.

I believe that Mrs. Ferris is on the right road. Get the children and teach them the way. You do not need to tell them that there is a life beyond, but they will tell you, and if you will but listen, they will convince you.

My son was somewhat older than his sister, he being 16. It took him about a week and a half, lessons daily, to develop so that he could see and converse some, but in about that time he was able to converse quite readily, but not so freely as his sister who was younger.

These are two instances of teaching children that have come under my observation, and I have no doubt that if the children were taught, these instances would be the common experience of all. I think the trouble with us older people is, that we have become so polarized, as it were, to superstitious beliefs, and material things, that it is hard to break away, and get ourselves in a condition to receive the truth, to become as little children. I feel that we would do well to follow the example of our orthodox brethren. Found schools to educate teachers, and then send our teachers, who themselves are properly educated, to teach the children. I will venture the opinion that no one who has ever been sufficiently developed, and along the right lines, to be able to converse with departed friends, has ever turned their back upon this knowledge. I believe also that if schools were founded and you begin to teach the children these broad and grand truths, the much-talked-of millennium will be ushered in clothed with all of the beauty and ecstasy with which it has been painted by poets and dreamers for ages.

Mrs. Ferris leaves here for the camp at Clinton to-morrow evening. I presume that she will remain there during the camp. I trust that the progressive Spiritualists will rally around her and give her such support and comfort as will send her on her way rejoicing.

REINCARNATION.

A Waste of Thought to Contemplate It.

Whether reincarnation be true, or false, is it time spent profitably to contemplate it? If it is false, it is useless to spend time on it. If true, there is great reason for giving the undivided attention to the things of the present embodiment.

The adherents of the doctrine admit that when we shall have become sufficiently matured, embodiments cease. Hence we argue the importance of getting as much earth growth as possible now.

Suppose a child neglects the first year of school, thinking what he will do the second year. He will surely be turned back.

Suppose a composer, seeking subject for the imagined stirring strains, lets the mind wander away musing on the skill of how to "call forth new feelings, at one time in the most delicate gradation, at another by the most abrupt transition." Would he be justified in expecting other than disappointment?

Some of the proselytes almost lose interest in the spirit world except as a waiting room for another return.

What is the evidence of the truth of successive embodiments? In our law courts it is evidence that governs. There are two kinds, direct and circumstantial. The reincarnationists have the same in their court, with the difference that theirs is direct and speculative. They do not deny that the one kind is speculative. Their direct, is where they claim to remember having lived on earth before. Is the remembrance reliable? Clairvoyance can be so deceptive. One may be clairvoyant unconsciously. The clairvoyant, or unconscious psychometrist, sees an ancient city, and becomes so familiar with it as to believe he once, in another body, lived there. There are so many instances where the Christian unconscious clairvoyants see their spirit friends. When we tell them that is Spiritualism, they deny it and declare it is God working for them.

In all of the different phases of psychic expression it is so easy for the untrained mind to be deceived. Again, the law of illusion comes right in here and may play many tricks. In a twilight how easy to imagine a stump a dangerous man. How we see faces on wall paper, when on nearer approach they vanish. Illustrations of illusion are innumerable. It is almost impossible to see a rocky mountain without seeing a human figure there. See the "man in the moon." May not the law of illusion also pertain to the spirit life psychic?

Their speculative evidence consists of reasoning that every mortal is entitled to, and must have, the experience of every other mortal. Is this possible? A game of football is played. One player is simply satisfied that he beat. Another boasts of displaying more science. Another sees promotion ahead, and that feeds his ambition. No two get the same experience out of the simple, one game of football. At a lecture no two will get the same experience out of it. A family of children grow up, under the same conditions, yet each child has diverging experience. In a four-years college course no two students get the same experience. At this rate what volume is large enough to contain figures enough to count all the successive embodiments necessary to give every mortal the experience of every other mortal? No two grains of sand are rolled and tossed about in the same way. No two snow flakes are of the same shape. No two persons are alike. Doesn't this look as if Nature doesn't take much stock in sameness?

The reincarnationists also appear to overlook the fact of opportunity in spirit life for every kind of growth and reform. The babe grows to the adult there. The false teaching here about theology and religion is outgrown there as readily as it is here. The inebriate overcomes his appetite. Servants here become masters there. The menial here can become a king there. Criminals grow up into saints. The pauper here, abounds there.

I have to confess my inability to see any convincing evidence of the truth in, or of a good reason for the doctrine of successive embodiments. But then I am not a pope, so am not infallible.

A Modern Helpmeet.

An item of news has just appeared which would have made the hair of our grandfathers stand on end with amazement. It is announced that the wife of Robert Gordon Jeffrey has been taking the summer course at the University of Chicago as proxy for her husband, while he was teaching school in another part of the city.

At the opening of the summer term, Mrs. Jeffrey registered for her husband, paid his tuition bill, and obtained leave from the dean to attend the classes in his stead till he could finish his school teaching. She explained that his financial circumstances made it necessary. She took copious notes, and when Mr. Jeffrey, his school work being ended, came to the college to take up his studies, he was enabled to add three months' senior credit to his bachelor degree. He had studied his wife's notes, and thus mastered the subjects.

The moral is that an educated wife can be a helpmeet to her husband in many ways that would have been impossible to the uneducated women of a century ago. In the four equal suffrage states, where women are politically educated as well, they carry their helpfulness to their husbands still further. At the recent festival of the New England Woman Suffrage Association, the Rev. Dr. Ecob, of Philadelphia, who spent two years in Colorado, said it was a common thing there for a busy physician or other overworked professional man before the municipal election to say to his wife: "You have had time to attend the meetings of the Civic Federation, where the records of the candidates were thoroughly discussed by people who knew all about them; you have got up the facts; now you tell me." If his wife had not been able to give him this help, he would not have voted, or else would have had to vote without much light on the subject. Instead of one unintelligent vote being cast, two votes were cast intelligently for good government.

A modern American wife of the right kind is the very best helpmeet a modern man can have.

DR. PHELON'S LETTER.

Brief Notes on Various Matters of Interest.

San Francisco is par excellence, the watering place of the world. Not a single day during the month that is supposed to boil men's blood and blister the heart and brain, in which one's occupation, no matter how laborious, could not be carried forward, in sun or shade. To the Eastern mind, July suggests straw hats, gossamer underclothing, and the usual outfit supposed to be necessary for the climate of Hades.

If you are outside of the city, and ask the native about the state of the weather, he will say: "Well, no, it isn't very hot here; but over in Dodrosh county, they do say it has been uncommon hot." It makes me think of the rurales of Illinois, forty years ago, when asked (as they frequently were) if there was any of their favorite disease, the "milk-sick," in their locality, the reply invariably was: "No, stranger, we don't have any hereabouts, but over in the next county, there's heaps of it." The stories of high thermometers must be taken with several grains of allowance. They are not nearly as terrific in the happening, as they seem to be in the reading by those interested, at a distance, of the absolute necessity of a longer tube with more degrees, for the accurate measurement of the unbridled heat.

General Barnes, the brave soldier, able statesman, brilliant advocate and loyal citizen has passed on to the country whose communications with this are only by telegraph and telephone. As a scholar, a jurist and a true comrade, he is mourned by a large circle of friends and acquaintances. It seems hard, always, to part with those whom we recognize as the world's brightest and best workers, while those who are and will be, as long as they live, burdens upon the communities among whom they reside, will be allowed to linger. It must be that the discipline we of this generation require is: "to have the poor and incapable always with us." The able helpers and workers in life's great business fields, either are wearied with the unvarying monotony; or crushed out of living by the opposing conditions pouring down on their devoted heads.

The talk of the town for many days, has been the speculation whether Jeffries or Fitzsimmons could stand up under the most pounding. It is not necessary to go far to classify the principals or the subordinate conditions attaching themselves thereto. The roaming herds of buffalo, wild horses, deer and other animals have always the same contention. But they do not bet. These men, left over from the days of knight-errantry, have been allowed to slug one another, and teach the noble (?) art of self-defense to a crowd that netted over $30,000 gate money. It is a pity that, in all betting matches, both sides cannot be satisfied with the outcome. The winning side seldom grumbles, but to the losing side, the whole business is a fake, after their bets are decided against them. But the thing so like a cyclone has gone by. It will take a long time to smooth out the effects. How hard it is to be good. Months of attainment vanish before the hot passion winds of a single night.

We notice as an item of local news, that the island formed at the mouth of the Sacramento river is to be protected by levees and thus a lot of arable land will be added to the wealth of the state.

Mackay, one of the "big four," who introduced the Virginia Consolidated mine to the world, has crossed the "great divide," to where neither his physical endurance nor business sagacity will be of any moment. He was most sane up to the last. This he evinced by deeding his millions to his heirs, instead of willing it to the lawyers, by the inevitable contest that always follows such a document in this state. A will has no show whatever in California courts, especially if it disposes, or attempts to dispose of a goodly amount of wealth. The Probate Court is filled to overflowing with the wrecks of wills that were supposed to be defect-proof when they were launched by the testators. But deeds are a horse of another color. When they are properly put on record, it is very hard to get a reversal.

Doctor Peebles is still stirring up the people of the Austral Continent, on the subject of Spiritualism and its kindred topics. We all know of the clearness of his logic, and the beauty of his rhetoric. It is always delightful to listen to the speech of a man who is talking from the fullness of his knowledge on any subject. Doctor Peebles is one of that kind. While he is always full he never "slops over." We trust that the date of his next visit here is not so far distant.

I have letters from several of the camp-meetings of the country, in widely-separated localities. With a singular unanimity, they speak of increased interest in spiritual ideas and spiritual power. In some places, it seems as if the cause had been awakened to new activity of light and life. May this apparent rebirth of vital energy and forceful life, be really what it seems, and the beauty and helpfulness of this New Old thought, thus borne in upon us, stimulate and turn all our hearts to the highest.

A CALIFORNIA PICTURE.

Every man that comes into our visible, material world accomplishes that whereunto he was sent. We talk of man's failures to do the work he undertakes for himself. But is it not true that the niche he is to fill must be occupied, because as a part of the whole he is to be placed as the thought of the Supreme Architect has decided, and not by his own idea or conception thereof? It is the Universal plan to which we are subjected, and not to any personal adaptation of weak, fallacious, short-sightedness, on the human line. We are but chipped pieces of material, helping to make up the totality of the vast mosaic, which has been in the building for uncountable eons of existence.

We mourn, because we are delving among the things it pleases us to name common or unclean. We do not or will not understand that every process of Nature is of equal importance. All are links of one great chain, of Universal unfolding. One depending on all others and each bringing glory and honor to the worker, in proportion to the thoroughness of the doing.

I am penning these lines from one of the hills toward the western end of Golden Gate Park, which is, and always will be to San Francisco, what Central Park is to New York City, and Jackson Park is to Chicago. But San Francisco's Park has unlimited possibilities before it. The soil in and about it seems to the stranger to be as bare and unpromising as the great Mojave Desert. But let the hose of constant irrigation be turned upon it anywhere, and, lo! the grass grows, shrubs and flowering plants spring up; evergreens of all varieties, from the pines and firs of the North, to the acacia and eucalyptus of the South, climb the hills and perch noddingly on the summits. All over the state it is the same principal condition to be applied, and the same result. Water is the creator of herbage, flowers and fruit, from apparently the most arid lands. Without it, the whole country is a howling wilderness of sand and disintegrating, volcanic rock. The three conditions of reclamation are sand, to hold the plant right side up; water to keep it saturated; and the semi-tropical sun with its voluptuous fertilizing energy. At once, the grand, transformation scene begins.

During the Midwinter Fair, Geo. W. Childs, the Philadelphia philanthropist, conceived the idea of putting his name in a public place, on this coast. To that end he donated a monument of himself to the park authorities, at the base of which I am sitting. In deference to the Spanish legacy to the New World, of Jesuit Catholicism, the granite of which it is composed is cut and carved into the form of a cross. The shaft rises from a substantial pedestal about seven feet in height, to between thirty and forty feet into the upper air. It can be seen from any part of the city, when no intervailing hill obstructs.

As I look in front of me, I see in the blue distance the great Ocean of Peace, fog-enshrouded, as it often is. I wonder how it appeared to Balboa, the day he climbed to the top of the last line of the Coast Range, and then at the head of his little band took possession of it and all its adjacent lands, in the name of the king of Spain. He had but little comprehension of the size of his job which he thus turned over to his master, the king. But he did demonstrate when he saw the unnamed sea for the first time, to mankind, for all ages to come, that the globe was round. Incidentally he made his own name immortal.

Behind me, in all its growing newness, lies the great city of the Far West, whose situation has made it what it is and will be. One can yet count the decades of its building fashions, from the shanty of the camp, to the palace of the successful miner, who felt that he had a first lien on the whole earth. I can see only a part of the residence portion. The business and residence portion most closely settled is hidden by a range of hills running across the peninsula, on which San Francisco is so comfortably ensconced. No business is as yet done on the ocean side. All its shipping must pass through the Golden Gate into the Bay, before it can either receive or deliver its cargo of freight or passengers. The peculiar location confuses strangers, as to the points of the compass. But when one stands on the beach, and sees the sun go down behind the waters, it helps out wonderfully the sense of locality.

On the left hand are a range of hills, built up of sand which the restless remorseless sea has left here, scooped up after a pattern and fashion of its own liking. There are basin-like depressions and single mountains. On some of these evergreens have obtained footing and are doing well. Sutro took pains to have an extensive tract of hitherto bare land planted with evergreens. I prefer his monument to Childs'. In front of this pine forest, about half-way up the declivity, stands the University of California, a prominent feature of a grand picture.

To my right is the wonderful bay, which has never yet, nor ever will be, crowded. It could receive at once all the merchant marine and navies of the whole world. For once, a maritime city is well located. But the fog has come up of the ocean, and hiding the water and the lower parts of the land on the farther side of the Bay, leaves the summits and peaks of the range of mountains of which Mt. Tamapias is a prominent feature, floating on a vaporous sea. A glance assures us, however, that the mountains have not slipped their cables.

Over all this picture, whose sketching fails to fully convey the reality, broods the warm coloring of a semi-tropical climate, whose heat warns us in urgent tones to seek the sheltering shadow. A cool sea-breeze at the same time prophylactic and tonic, sweeps up from the blue waters. Looking over the whole picture once more, I wish that all our readers were to be here with the Knights of Pythias, in the near future, and see the half that is not told.

No Wonder!

The old black mammy, her day's work done, sat on the doorstep contentedly smoking her pipe and "thinking of the happy days gone by." Jane, the servant of the neighboring family, came over to the fence. "That's right, auntie," she said; "take all de fresh air you can; it's gwine to rain to-morrow."

"How d'ye know it's gwine to rain to-morrow?"

"De papers say so."

"Ma Good Lawd!" ejaculated auntie, "no wondah we's havin' hurricanes an' cyclones an' tornadoes; why, dey've even taken de weather out of de Lawd's hands!"—New York Times.

STRIVING AFTER THE IDEAL. RECEIVING JESUS. A LECTURE BY H. W. B. MYRICK.

To receive a person is to accept him. It is to take him as he presents himself, and for what he claims to be. Mr. Choate is received in England as the representative of the United States. If Kaiser Wilhelm visits this country, as is contemplated, he will be received as the Emperor of Germany and so regarded by everybody.

Now, shall we receive Christ? Is it to our advantage in any way that we accept him? This is a really great question. It was Pilate who enquired: "What shall I do, then, with Jesus?" And we too, friends, have Jesus upon our hands for consideration. I solemnly affirm that each person here ought to settle the "Christ Question." Not perhaps that each one need to settle it historically, or logically even, but in a practical fashion. We ought to settle it simply as a matter of influence that will affect our views of life and to a greater or less extent shape the growth of our characters. I ought to be able, and you ought to be able, to announce calmly and intelligently that I accept Christ, or with equal fairness and understanding to say I reject him. Let us try and do this.

In the first place, then, Jesus is presented to us as the Son of God. It is not a theological conception, nor a Pauline idea, but the simple claim of Jesus himself. He claimed to be a divine person. He assumed to possess and to habitually use powers and capabilities that were extra if not superhuman. He deliberately proclaimed himself from God, from above, out of heaven, and his disciples, who were most familiar with him, set him before us a divine being, the Son of God. Nothing is more certain than that the New Testament, in the whole of its content, presents Jesus as more than an ordinary mortal, and as the divinely glorious Son of God—as "God manifested in the flesh." He was Immanuel, God with us. He was the Word made flesh. Let us be perfectly fair to him in this claim—he was super-human, extramortal, Divine.

Now, can we accept him as such?

I know there are difficulties in the way. Reason finds many objections. Paul called it the "mystery of godliness." The thoughtful mind, as Nicodemus, evermore enquires: "How can these things be?" Doubt, skepticism, hesitation attend the steps of the real investigator. I shall not remove these difficulties; I only hope to minimize them. I shall not attempt to make it reasonable but only to show that it is at least not unreasonable. It will be shown that there are facts—facts accepted without question by everyone—that are just as mysterious and improbable as the superhuman character of Jesus Christ. If, then, we accept commonly and necessarily certain facts just as difficult and unreasonable of belief as the Divinity of Christ it should disarm us of violent opposition to that teaching even if it did not lead us to embrace it.

It is held that Jesus was born of a virgin, without a human father. I acknowledge the difficulty. Without a doubt it is unreasonable. My first impulse is to say I do not believe it. But I will not say it—at least, I will not say it is impossible. For I know something else—not merely believe—I know a thing that is more wonderful than this reported birth of Jesus, an actual fact which is so stupendous as to utterly dwarf into insignificance the miraculous conception of Jesus in the womb of a virgin. And while you may have been stumbling over the account of Jesus' birth you have never so much as even stubbed your toe on this other great boulder in the way. Go, in your imagination, back of Jesus, clear back to the first man that ever was. Think how that primal man came into being—he did not even have a virgin mother to begin with! Without a human father and also without a human mother, the first man of the race presents to us a problem of origin in comparison with which the generation of Jesus is not worthy of mention. No matter whether you are a Theist or an atheistic Evolutionist, the origin of the first man or woman, or both of them, is more of a mystery than the "mystery of godliness" involved in the conception and birth of Jesus. Any explanation whatever of the origin of the first man is more mysterious and incomprehensible than the New Testament account of the nativity of Jesus. The first chapter of Genesis presents a greater mystery than the first chapter of Matthew. One describes the beginning of the first Adam; the other of the second Adam.

Mark well! I do not say this consideration makes the gospel story of the generation of Jesus reasonable. I only say this, that we have a fact, the fact that sometime and somewhere there was a first man, a human being with neither father nor mother, and that this undeniable fact is very much harder to understand than the fact (if it is a fact) which we are required to believe in regard to Jesus, Son of God. And, my friend, as the thing you know is really more incredible than the thing your orthodox neighbor believes, do not discredit your own intellect by sneering at his beliefs. We may say then that what we know to be true is more wonderful than what the church asks us to believe.

But I want you to think of another very wonderful thing in this connection. I call your attention to those abnormal cases of development which we call prodigies. Certain persons appear now and then who possess one or more faculties which are so extraordinary in their development as to be regarded almost if not quite miraculous. These abnormal powers, being impossible to the average human being and not the result of study or training, may properly be regarded as super-human endowments.

There was Reuben Field, living in Central Missouri. He was a mathematical prodigy. He could not read his own name, but he was wonderful in figures. He would solve any problem you gave him instantly. Tell him the number of miles between New York and San Francisco, and in a moment he would tell you just how many inches it was. Tell him how far from one station to another, and give him the diameter of a car wheel, and he would instantly let you know how many revolutions of the wheel there would be in the distance. Tell him how many thicknesses of paper in an inch, and he would tell you in an instant how many sheets of paper it would take to make a stack a mile high. You can say the multiplication table up to twelve—maybe. He could say it up to a hundred as easy as you say twice two are four. You can carry along a quantity in your mind and grasp the idea probably up to a million, but this man would run out to billions, trillions, and ten points beyond and have as clear a conception of it as you have of ten thousand. He was indorsed by Senator Cockerill. His answers to difficult problems were often tested by learned professors and skilled mathematicians and always proved correct.

Take another case. You will remember when the negro musician, Blind Boone, was up here at Albany. He has no knowledge of music as usually understood—never took lessons. But he plays anything on the piano that he hears once. At Albany, Prof. Neff played a very difficult composition which was absolutely new to Boone, yet that negro sat down at the piano before that large audience and repeated it just exactly, with rests, expression, pedal effects and all, like Prof. Neff had executed it. Blind Tom could do the same thing. Now, that is a wonderful thing to happen. No amount of practice or culture can enable even our great, famous pianists to do such a thing. Paderewski, with all his toil, training and skill, cannot do what that ignorant negro can, who never took a lesson and never had a moment of musical culture. The negro and his remarkable performances are not only super-normal—they may fairly be called super-human. Super-human, I am aware, implies that the power is more than human and I am fain to believe it is. Such musical ability, such mathematical power, is not a human accomplishment at all. Patience, practice, study, nothing can develop these wonderful gifts. The man who has such a power is allied to a super-human aid, call it God, spirit or what you will.

I cite you one other illustration of this nature. The son of Joel C. Fenley, Uvalde, Texas, has what is called the "X-ray" sight. Walking over the earth in the night he can see the veins and streams of water down in the ground and locate wells with infallible certainty. He has been tested absolutely all through that country. These facts are vouched for by Judge W. Vansickle and Hon. John N. Garner, members of the State Legislature, and for whom the boy located streams of water several hundred feet beneath the surface of the earth. This lad seems to have a supernatural vision so that he looks down through the solid crust of earth as easily as the ordinary person looks through a glass of water. This remarkable power of sight in the Fenley boy is as wonderful as the music of Blind Tom and the mathematics of Reuben Field. And all three of them, each in his own field, are possessed of powers which, as I have said, are literally super-human. Only that which is common to humanity, or of which the average man is capable, may be called human. Powers which are above the average human being, and which he cannot acquire by any process of culture or training, are clearly super-human powers.

Very well now. Let us suppose a man born into the world having Fenley's sight, Field's mathematics, Boone's music, etc. Don't you see? We would have a man the equal of Jesus, a really super-human man in the ordinary meaning of the word. I show you this that the super-human Jesus is not impossible: nay, that he is not unreasonable. The same Power that endowed these three men with a portion of the miraculous could give to Jesus a completer measure of it; in fact, as one wrote of him, "In Him all the fulness of the Godhead dwelt bodily." If you tell me it is hard to believe the marvellous things ascribed to Jesus, I reply that it is equally as hard to believe the things ascribed to Boone, Field, Fenley, et al. But we do, or may, know these later things are true. So that, precisely as in the first line of reasoning, I reach this conclusion: The thing we know is as wonderful, or more so, than the thing we are asked to believe. Not a tenet of orthodox Christianity which is offered for belief but can be fairly paralleled by actual, undeniable facts, by conditions and necessary conclusions which the most radical of objectors are compelled to admit.

I pass from this phase of the subject by saying: The acceptance of Christ as the Son of God, as a superhuman being, is not at all incompatible with human experience or the soundest reasoning based thereon.

But while that is true I am going to ask you to receive Jesus on another count altogether. He is presented to us as an example of love, mercy, patience, pity, forgiveness, kindness and self-sacrifice for the good of the race. He taught all these virtues and gave an object lesson of their value in his own life. And I ask to receive him on these grounds, as a teacher of good and an example of it. Suppose I read to you the story of feeding five thousand people on five loaves and two fishes, and one man here says, "I will accept him on that. If Jesus could do such a wonderful thing as that I want to be his disciple." And suppose I preach again from the beatitudes to you: "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness;" "Blessed are the pure in heart," and so on. And another man says, "I will receive him on that. I want to be pure in heart, and if Jesus taught like that I will be his disciple and follow him."

Now which of these two would be most likely to prove the best disciple? Which of them, honestly, do you suppose would follow Jesus from the loftiest motive? Well, my brethren, I have settled the matter for myself. I receive Jesus as the pure, loving, tender Friend, the teacher and exemplar to my soul of spiritual graces, divine sympathies and beautiful ministries. And I try to get men to receive him as such. I utterly refuse to appeal to men upon any other ground. If my only hope of getting men to receive Jesus was to preach his so-called miracles, to dwell upon the marvellous things he is said to have done, I would quit preaching this moment. If men are so steeped in superstition and so callous to all moral considerations that the tender, beautiful teaching of Jesus and the exquisite glory of his loving, helpful life, will not reach them I have nothing to offer them. I have no sermons in my repertoire on the miracles. I consider the man who can only be reached in that manner not worth the effort.

It is worthy of remark that the most prominent of Jesus' disciples became his followers before he ever did a miraculous thing, and the twelve apostles were chosen and actively serving before an intimation was given that he was divine. Yet these men were his chosen. So I ask you, not on account of wonders and signs, but as lovers of the pure and good to take Jesus as teacher and guide. "For the Jews require a sign and the Greeks seek after wisdom, but we preach Christ and him sacrificed."

But some one will say to me: "You are idealizing Jesus; the character you are presenting is not, and never was, a real character, it is only an ideal. Very well, my friend. So be it if only you receive him. The fact is we are saved and our uplifting comes from our ideals. The lover idealizes his mistress, and she who is a very real woman to all others, becomes to him an incarnation of all beauty, purity and goodness. And the experience is good for him. It exalts him, what time the vision lasts, far above his sordid unworthy self. His ideal lifts him up.

We have idealized George Washington as a nation. What the real Washington was is of little moment to us; the ideal Washington possesses our mind and heart. Brave, true, chivalric, steadfast, loyal, he is our hero! And who can measure the value of this ideal, or tell how much it has stimulated our patriotism and uplifted our valorous souls to duty.

So, brother, receive Jesus if you will. Idealize him to your utmost capability. Clothe him with every virtue and glory the imagination can bring forth. Attribute to him every quality of mercy, goodness and love that you can think of. And then love him! Love him passionately, steadfastly, forever! Try to be like him. Idealize him, conceive him just as good as it is possible for your mind to paint him, and then earnestly strive to be like him. And if you will do this, Jesus—this ideal Jesus—will save you. And really, brethren, I know of no other way in which Jesus can save men. I repeat, we are saved by our ideals. It must forever be true that "If a man cannot erect himself above himself, how poor a thing is man!"

This is receiving Jesus. It is a striving after the ideal, and so a true growth into salvation.

"Strike deep thy roots, O heavenly vine,
Within this earthly sod;
Most human, and yet most divine,
The flower of man and God."

A Leaf from the Book of Life.

Into my little lonely cabin where mean-faced Poverty is constant companion and friend, old Age has now crept and drawn a yellow, withered mask over a face where enchanting
Youth once smiling dwelt; has bidden the once full speaking eyes to retreat to hollow caverns and dwell evermore in dimness; has mysteriously placed a curious, comical quaver in the voice and changed the light, springing footstep to a funeral pace.

And with this new companion who plays such practical jokes on me, comes another, proclaiming herself the natural hand-maiden ever attendant upon the steps of Age, whose name is Reflection, and by whose influence I turn my gaze away from the present living panorama of changing scenes to memory's gallery where the unmoving statues of past years remain to more deeply impress the lessons of the great teacher, Life. On the walls of this gallery now hang engravings of all unworthy acts and motives; all the black mistakes; all the falseness, indirectness and littleness of soul which I, even I, with mine own hand have so deeply and truthfully wrought on the too visible and eternal canvas; and as I gaze the dark robes of sorrowful Regret rustle close at my side.

But now a venerable form rises before me, whose whitened locks are a glory about a noble head, and whose name is Wisdom; and he whispers these words of comfort and advice:

"Stand not in the shadow of vain Regret when you look on these pictures, which are here for your instruction. The past with all its pain and its mistakes was necessary for your growth. Gather you up now the gold of its consequences, and with this new wealth and the broader, truer view it gives, joyfully and thankfully pursue your journey. Soon thou shalt leave thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea."

And the radiant face of Hope once more beams from afar through the dark clouds of mortality.

Each changing form, frail vesture of decay
The soul, unclad, forgets it once hath worn,
Stained with the travel of the weary day
And shamed with rents from every wayside thorn.—Holmes.

ANGELS' SONG.

(Tune: Sweet Home.))

Oh! could I sing as angels sing,
In joy and peace and love,
Of all the bliss of spirit life
In that blest home above,
Then I could rise on wings of light,
Above earth's sorrows soar,
And grasp celestial joys so near,
That lie along the shore.

Chorus:—
Home, home, sweet, sweet home,
Glad angels are singing of sweet, restful home.

If I could sing as angels sing,
With soul-inspiring power,
I'd move the hearts of others then,
With triumph every hour;
I'd give to them of joys I knew,
Impart celestial good,
Inspiring them to join the song
With millions on the road.

Chorus:—Home, home, etc.

I long to sing as angels sing,
Let billowy music roll,
Till all my being beams with bliss
And melodies fill the soul.
Oh! flow adown seraphic song
In waves of love and light,
Each note gives hope of future good,
A world of pure delight.

Chorus:—Home, home, etc.

I'd gladly sing as angels sing,
When I am called to go,
To leave this earthly tenement,
With mortal cares below,
When pearly gates shall open wide,
And kindred welcoming,
I'd meet them at the riverside,
I'd hear them sweetly sing.

Chorus:—Home, home, etc.

I hope to sing as angels sing,
When I have passed away,
To view the lands of richer joys
In realms beyond the bay;
With courage, then, I'll labor on
Till that blest day shall come,
Let deeds of charity and love
Build up my heavenly home.

Chorus:—Home, home, etc.

There comes to me in angel song
A richness all its own,
Of verdant fields in spirit lands
With fountains all o'erflown,
It tells me that dear ones come back
In light and liberty,
They bring the brightest star of heaven—
Blest Immortality.

Chorus:—
Home, home, sweet, sweet home,
Glad angels are singing of sweet, restful home.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

THE PROPAGANDA IN BRAZIL.

We have received from Manaus, the capital of the province of Amazonas, in Brazil, two copies of the "Mensageiro," or Messenger, which is published twice a month in a town containing less than 5,000 inhabitants. It is edited by Don Carlos T. Gonçalves; and it is exceedingly interesting to note the great vitality of Spiritualism on the banks of the Amazon, as shown by the impressive fact that the Society for Spiritual Propagandism in Manaus maintains a kind of college in which young people of both sexes obtain gratuitous instruction. It receives students for two courses, primary and secondary, the aim in both being to qualify pupils for the practical business of life. The first course comprises three grades, and the professors are prohibited from going outside the class of subjects presented for study in each. The curriculum of instruction for those receiving secondary education embraces a thorough knowledge of the Portuguese, English and French languages, arithmetic, commercial correspondence, geography and astronomy. All these things, we repeat, are imparted gratuitously, the institution being entirely maintained by the Spiritualists of the province of Amazonas, which only numbered 80,000 souls in 1890, being about one-fifth of the population of Melbourne and its suburbs.

We have a grand total of 320 students who graduated in one year from this popular university, and each of these would be more or less imbued with the principles of Spiritualism, and would always look back with gratitude upon the devoted men and women who had provided the funds necessary to qualify them to enter upon the battle of life well armed for the conquest, and with minds emancipated from the degrading superstitions of the church in which some of them were probably born.

THE PRINCESS KARADJA.

The "Messager," of Liege, translates from the "Tidningen," of Stockholm, an account of an interview accorded by the Princess Karadja to a newspaper reporter, in the course of which she entered very fully into the various phenomena of which that earnest and intrepid lady had been an eye and ear witness. Not the least remarkable of these related to the mediumship of Madame Abend, of Berlin, whose controls enable her to answer questions addressed to her in foreign languages, in the same tongue in which they are propounded, although she has no knowledge of any but German. The mere fact that an interview of this kind is fully reported in a secular newspaper, is very significant in itself, and shows the interest which is being taken in such subjects by the general public in Europe.

A REMARKABLE SENSITIVE.

One of the most solidly established and conservative of the daily newspapers in Paris is the "Journal des Debats," and this opens its columns to a detailed account of the peculiar gift of a young sensitive, living in the village of Ayaltown, near Antonia, in the district of the Lebanon ranges, in Syria. She has the peculiar faculty of being able to "sense" the presence of water underground without the use of a divining rod. She is, in fact, as the brethren of the College of Lazarists at Beyrout, who have tested her powers, admit, a clairvoyant, to whom the crust of the earth is transparent, so that she actually sees the springs that she describes, and states, with approximate accuracy, the depths at which the water will be struck. She is only fourteen years of age, and all her indications have proved to be unerring. On being asked how long she had been conscious of the possession of this gift, she replied "about three years," adding that she had been afraid to speak of it lest she should be accused of sorcery. "Here is a subject who ought certainly to be brought to France," observes the staid and steady going "Journal des Debats." Let us hope that if she is so, her qualities as a delicate sensitive will not suffer by her contact with stupid and skeptical scientists, whose mischievous interference might disorder the finer conditions necessary for the successful exercise of her mediumship.

A DISTINGUISHED ADHERENT.

We recently mentioned the striking testimony, based upon personal experience—borne to the truths of Spiritualism by no less eminent a lady than Mme. Augusta Holmes, the famous musical composer, who is a resident in Paris. We have now to add the name of M. Victor Joncieres, the composer of "Dimitri," "Lusignan," and other celebrated operas. He has been interviewed by M. Bois on behalf of the "Matin," to whom he related a series of remarkable phenomena which had compelled him, after having ridiculed Spiritualism, to become a firm believer in it. And if M. Bois is not likewise convinced by the manifestations which he himself has witnessed, he must be one of those men who refuse to believe the evidence of their own senses. Seated at an open window in the dining-room, with the sunshine streaming into the apartment, he heard a military band approaching, and, more in jest than earnest, he exclaimed, laughingly, "If there be a spirit present he ought to give us an accompaniment to that music." No sooner said than done. An unseen hand immediately began to repeat, thumping on the table, in rythmic strokes, the cadences of the quick step march which was being played, and it gradually dropped into a diminuendo movement, as the band disappeared in the distance. "Now give a good roulade at the finish," he said, and a sonorous roll was given with such violence that the table trembled under our feet. "I laid my hand upon it," he added, "and I felt the trepidation of the wood struck by an invisible force, very distinctly. At my request the table was turned upside down (and still by invisible hands in broad daylight), and I made a very careful examination, both of it and of the floor, but failed to discover anything capable of explaining the phenomenon." And what have those who talk of "telepathy" and "unconscious cerebration" to say upon this subject, we should very much like to know?

ACTIVITY IN BELGIUM.

We learn with sincere gratification from "Le Messager," of Liege, that the Spiritualist Union which has its headquarters at the Cafe Proyincial, in the Place St. Lambert in that city, has, for some time past, been exhibiting a most laudable activity. Every Sunday afternoon at half-past three, a conversation is held or a lecture delivered on Spiritualism, and numerous speakers, including Messieurs Wathieu, Fraikin, Polet, Delbouille, Longree, Bissot, and Devaux, have volunteered to help forward the good cause. The Spiritualist Union has likewise decided upon a series of conversations and a course of Spiritualism for children. This course will be open to the general public. It will be given on alternate Sundays at two o'clock in the afternoon, the intermediate Sundays being set apart for the ordinary seances.

STAMPING OUT SPIRITUALISM.

The German Emperor has set his heart, it appears, upon stamping out Spiritualism in Prussia; has forbidden every person belonging to the court to have anything to do with it, and refuses to receive anyone who is supposed to be guilty of believing in one of the fundamental doctrines of the Old and New Testament; namely, the intercourse of incarnate with discarnate spirits. Thus much we learn from that excellent publication, the "Revue des Etudes Psychiques," edited by the Count Cesare di Vesme, which is now published in Paris, instead of at Turin. The London "Daily News" contains the following significent comments on this persecution from its correspondent at Berlin:

"If His Majesty really intends to carry his threats into execution, he will have to renovate his entourage, for the persons who occupy themselves with these questions are very numerous amongst his habitual society, and above all in that of the Empress. It is well known that many ladies belonging to what may be called the private circle of Her Majesty, sympathize with the movement and accord it their support. This is the case not merely in the society of the court, but quite as much so in the official world, where Spiritualism and similar "isms" have numerous partizans. Among these may be named one of the best German diplomats, a member of the most intimate circle of His Majesty. This circle comprehends many other Spiritualists besides." Prominent among these is Marshal von Waldersee, who is chief of the general staff of the German army, and is married to an American lady, who probably directed his attention to Spiritualism.

Commenting on this persecution, the Count di Vesme remarks: "Would not one believe that one was reading what the Roman historians of the first centuries of the church wrote with respect to the Christians who likewise stood near the throne of the Caesars? In order to render the resemblance more striking, it must be added that this movement of anti-spiritual, anti-scientific coercion is the work of the high Lutheran clergy of the empire."

How true are the words of Shakespeare:

"Man, proud man,
Drest in a little brief authority,
Most ignorant of what he's most assured,
His glassy essence,—like an angry ape,
Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven,
As makes the angels weep."

The "glassy essence" of the German Emperor may crumble into dust in a moment, at the touch of one of those spirits whose existence he derides, and whose power he ignores, and what then? He would find himself in a world where he would be divested, like every other monarch, of all the insignia of royalty, and would stand in the position of a shivering mendicant, before a cohort of spiritual intelligences, in whose presence—remembering his persecution of Spiritualism upon earth—he would feel abased and remorseful, overwhelmed by a sense of his own littleness, and of the criminal abuse of the immense power entrusted to him, and vainly wishing that he could become a man again, if only for a few hours, in order that he might undo that which now has to be expiated by long years of painful effort.

Few things are more pitiable than the spectacle of the Emperor of a great nation endeavoring to put back the sun in the heavens, or, what is equivalent to it, striving to arrest the progress of a movement, which originated in, and is directed from, the spirit world, and in the promotion of which we mortals are impelled, sustained, encouraged and inspired by legions upon legions of spiritual beings, whose appointed mission and delightful occupation it is to lift manhood out of the mire of materialism and to spiritualize human nature.

A CATHOLIC ON SPIRITUALISM.

M. Eugenio Checchi, a well known journalist, publishes in the "Giornale d'Italia" the report of an interview on the subject of Spiritualism, which he has had with Senator Fogozzaro, who is equally distinguished as a romance writer, a philosophical thinker, a liberal and a fervent Catholic. Being asked whether he considered an investigation of the phenomena as, in any sense of the word, irreligious, he replied: "One may occupy one's self scientifically with the phenomena in question without harm to religion. I am a sincere believer; nevertheless my profound and immutable beliefs do not prevent me from occupying myself with what may conduct me to the truth. No doubt I have heard people assert that such manifestations are the work of malefi-cent spirits; but for my own part, I believe, on the contrary, that, with all due reserve as to the nature of the phenomena, one can scarcely affirm them to be attributable to other than good and beneficent spirits. * * Nor shall I cease to declare that it is a duty, a strict duty of humanity to study these perplexing phenomena." Questioned concerning fraudulent mediums, M. Fogozzaro replied: "The cause of Spiritualism cannot suffer because such a medium has been unmasked. Golden coins are minted; and if there are counterfeit coiners, this does not prevent the issue and currency of genuine money. Imposture proves nothing. * * There are mysteries in Spiritualism, no doubt, but the more extraordinary these mysteries may be, the more imperative is it upon us to study them. And to do this scientifically is the duty of all those who wish the truth to triumph."

If the Lutheran clergymen of Berlin, who are persecuting Mme. Rothe, are capable of shame, they must blush to read the liberal sentiments of a truth-seeking and highly gifted Roman Catholic, like M. Fogozzaro.

SOMEWHERE.

Somewhere we'll find the love we've missed;
Somewhere it waits for us,
An early glory glorified
To make self luminous.

Somewhere we'll find long-sought success,
Not failure, by our side,
And one by one our dreams shall come,
And smile at us glad-eyed.

Somewhere we'll find again the youth
That rightly shall be ours
Through all eternity; the youth
That in the spirit flowers.

To all things fair and beautiful,
To life all rich and true.
To knowledge and its promises,
This, both for me and you.

Be patient, heart! God keepeth well
A somewhere for each one;
And what ye have in truth desired,
Be sure it shall be done.

"Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never knewn what drink was afore," says he. "It bates the Lachrymatchrystal out ov the face," says he—"it's Necthar itself, it is, so it is!" says he, wiping his episkolical mouth wid the cuff of his coat. Paper, 25cts.; cloth, 50 cents. OUR ECLECTIC MAGAZINE

. . . OF . . .

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

CONCERNING SUPERNORMAL PERCEPTION.

Can a visual perception of external objects be obtained in any way than by means of the physical organ of sight?

Probably a large majority of people, educated and uneducated, would answer decidedly, No.

Yet there is a very respectable minority who would answer Yes.

Again: Can a silver dollar be photographed while shut up in a box made of wood an inch thick? Doubtless a large majority of the same people would say No; yet a very respectable minority would say Yes. So if we ask, Can a piece of iron or steel wire be made to burn like a tow string without even keeping it in contact with fire? a majority would say No, but a respectable minority would say Yes. Yet there is no doubt that the photograph can be taken by the X-ray and that steel will burn in oxygen gas or in liquid air. So it is evident that facts are not admitted into the realm of verities by majorities. What, then, is the criterion—upon what grounds are facts admitted? Simply upon the consensus—the general assent of those who have studied and observed the facts—in short, of those who know the subjects; the opinions of others does not count, no matter how intelligent they may be in other and unrelated subjects.

Lucidity, clairvoyance, or second-sight has been affirmed by the few who know and denied by the many who do not know ever since men have been able to record thoughts and events, but it has held its place—and more intelligent people accept it intelligently now than ever before. During the long war between Syria and Israel the King of Syria had good reason to suspect that in some way the King of Israel received information of all his intended hostile movements, for he was always prepared to defeat Ham. So he called together his chiefs and demanded to know who it was among them who thus favored the King of Israel; to which one of the chiefs replied:

"It is none of thy servants, O King; but Elisha, a prophet that is in Israel, telleth the King of Israel the words that thou speakest in thy chamber."

Croesus, the rich King of Lydia, had some doubts about the reliability of the Greek oracles; so he sent a messenger to ascertain if the Pythoness could tell what he, the King, was doing upon a specified day and at a specified hour. This was the answer:

"There cometh to me the odor of lamb's flesh; it is seething, mixed with the flesh of a tortoise; brass is beneath it and brass is also above it."

The messenger returned with the answer, when it was found that Croesus, in order to do something most unlikely to be guessed or imagined, had cut to pieces a lamb and a tortoise and seethed them in a brazen vessel having a brazen cover.

Apollonius of Tyaneus, while delivering a discourse at Ephesus, suddenly stopped as if he had lost his train of thought—then, after a moment's hesitation, he shouted:

"Strike the tyrant—strike!" Observing the astonishment of his audience, he explained that at the time he stopped in his discourse the tyrant at Rome was slain. Subsequently it was found that Domitian, the reigning tyrant, was at that very moment assassinated.

SWEDENBORG'S LUCIDITY.

There is no better authenticated fact in history than the lucidity of Swedenborg in the following well-known incident: On a certain afternoon in September, 1756, he arrived at Gottenburg, 300 miles from Stockholm, which was the home of Swedenborg.

That evening there was a gathering of fifteen prominent people of the place to meet and welcome him. But Swedenborg was preoccupied and restless. He went out into the street and then returned, disturbed and anxious. He declared that there was a most destructive fire raging at Stockholm at that moment—that the house of a friend, whom he named, was already destroyed, and that his own was in imminent danger. At 8 o'clock, after two hours of anxiety, he announced that the fire was arrested only three doors from his own house.

This statement and the manner of obtaining the information created a great stir and wonder, not only among the guests who were assembled, but throughout the city. The following morning he was sent for by the Governor of the town, and to him he gave a detailed account of the conflagration and its course, and on Monday news was received from Stockholm confirming in every respect the statement given by Swedenborg.

Other perfectly verified instances of Swedenborg's lucidity are well known.

SAW FALL RIVER FIRE IN MAINE.

But cases are abundant also in more recent times and under our own observation.

It was in 1874, I think, that the Fall River fire occurred. At that time there was living at Brunswick, Me., Mr. John Fitzgerald, a temperance lecturer of considerable local reputation—ill, feeble and confined to his bed and able to converse but very little. On the Saturday morning of the fire Mrs. F. had arranged her husband for a nap and had gone to the stable, a few steps distant, when she was surprised by the cry of "Fire!" in tones so loud and startling that she rushed back only to hear her husband repeating the cry in loud, sharp tones—all the more startling as he had not spoken above a whisper for several days. At the same time he was trying to get out of bed and was excitedly calling for his clothes.

In astonishment Mrs. F. exclaimed: "What does all this mean?"

"Wife," said he, "there is a fire in a factory at Fall River—in the upper story, in the mule room. I see sparks and flame flying in all directions and the factory is full of women and children."

Mrs. F., also a public speaker and a most intelligent woman, told what followed to the editor of the Brunswick Telegraph. She said her husband all the time was trying to get out of bed, saying the fire was near him and he must hurry to assist those poor people who were in such danger. He gave orders in a loud voice, as if he were present:

"Close that door or the women and children will be burned to death!"

He had been a sailor and in a tone of contempt he exclaimed: "I could rig a better ladder than that—splice it here, splice it there! Don't jump from the window," he repeated again and again. To the firemen: "Why don't you do this? Why don't you do that?" "See those poor women and little children her hold, the weather was threatening, and the captain decided to return to port.

On Wednesday, February 9, the weather was very bad, and the water gained so rapidly that it was found necessary to abandon the vessel, which they did, taking to the boats at 6 o'clock Wednesday evening. They stayed by the ship until she went down, and then made the best course they could for Sydney.

The first boat contained the master—Captain Spruit—the boatswain, steward, an able seaman and a boy 16 years old. On Saturday the wind increased to a hurricane, the captain's boat was swamped and capsized, and the boy, Allen, was drowned. The boat righted. The captain and crew managed to scramble on board, and they spent the night in the boat filled with water. The next day the storm was still furious. The captain was washed overboard and was rescued with great difficulty by one of the men. Afterward the weather improved, they were picked up by a steamer and finally arrived at Sydney in a most bruised and wretched plight.

Captain Spruit's family resided in Balmain, a suburb of Sydney. On Thursday morning about 3 o'clock—the morning that the ship went down—the captain's daughter, Lily, 13 years old, rushed into her mother's room crying most piteously. She said to her mother, "Mamma, I am so frightened." Her mother asked her what was the matter. "Oh, see!" she said. "Dada's ship is wrecked. Dada comes home in rags, with his feet and legs all cut, and some of his men are drowned."

Her mother tried to make light of her fears, but the child could think of nothing else but her dream. She could not go to school that day—Thursday—on account of agitation and excitement.

Later she said: "I thought I saw my father get into the boat, that they put everything they could into the boats, and kept close to the ship until it went down. My father was in one of the boats and the boy and the boatswain, and two or three others I did not know. I saw the boat go over and the boy was drowned. I saw them pull my father back into the boat and my father came home, cut and bruised, and he had lost everything. It was stormy and I heard the wind howl."

Here the dreamer not only saw clairvoyantly what actually took place during the night while she dreamed, but, as often happens to the sub-conscious mind, prophetically what happened on the following days until her father's return.

HYPNOTISM AND CLAIRVOYANCE.

Many striking examples of such dreams—clairvoyant and prophetic—are reported by trustworthy people acquainted with the facts. If it is during the time that the ordinary conscious mind is in abeyance that the sub-conscious mind is specially active we should naturally expect examples of that activity to occur during the induced sleep or trance of hypnotism; and this we find to be very markedly the case. Almost every physician who makes use of hypnotism at all for therapeutic purposes occasionally meets with a patient who has supernormal perceptive faculties of some sort and to some degree, and some possessing the clairvoyant faculty in a very marked degree. I have during my thirty years' experience in hypnotic work for therapeutic purposes found at least five; some of the instances of clairvoyant perception by them have already been published, while others on account of personal reasons I am not at liberty to make public; but they have been sufficient to give me abundant experimental and personal proof of the clairvoyant faculty, and make it easy for me to credit cases reported by others. The following case is in point:

In the year 1850 a fleet of eleven vessels sailed from the port of Peterhead, England, for the purpose of prosecuting the business of seal and whale fisheries in the Arctic seas. Among these vessels were two named, respectively, the Hamilton Ross and Eclipse; and from the time of sailing until the return any communication between them and England was absolutely impossible. At that time the subject of mesmerism—the same as it now known as hypnotism—was attracting attention at Peterhead, and on the 22d of April of that year a lad was mesmerized and was able to tell what his sub-conscious mind perceived. Of course everybody was anxious about the absent vessels, and questions were asked concerning them. The boy in his mesmeric sleep in answer to these questions stated that the first ship to arrive this season would be the Hamilton Ross. He said that at that moment he saw the captain and surgeon of the vessel engaged in dressing the hand of the second mate, Cardno, who, he said, had by an accident lost a part of some of his fingers. The next evening the experiment was repeated, and the boy, when asked of the success of the vessels, replied that Captain Burnett, of the Hamilton Ross, would bring in over 100 tons of oil, and he would inform them about the others when he came, as he saw the captain of the Eclipse at that time giving him news.

On the 3d of May the first ship arrived from the Arctic regions, and it proved to be the Hamilton Ross, and in the first boat to come ashore with the captain was Cardno, with his bound-up hand in a sling. The statements of the mesmerized boy were of course known and commented upon all over town, and hundreds of men were watching the boat as it neared the dock; and when they at last recognized Cardno, with his wounded hand, the word spoken with bated breath went around:

"Mesmerism has come true."

Other incidents described proved correct, and Captain Burnett, who brought in only nineteen tons of oil the previous season, now brought home 150 tons.

Another clairvoyant revelation concerning adventures in the Arctic region was made by a lady in Scotland on the 17th of February, 1851, when, being entranced, she gave the latitude and longitude of Sir John Franklin, and also of Captain Austin, who was 400 miles away from him. These statements were published far and wide months before they were heard from, and on their return their reports showed that the statements made by the clairvoyant were both perfectly correct.

A STUPID BOY'S CLAIRVOYANCE.

Coming to clairvoyance with reference to objects near at hand, cases are numerous and striking—that of Ira Healy is remarkable. He was an ignorant, queer, and rather stupid lad 20 years of age, living with Rufus Sanborn, a hard-working farmer of intelligence and unimpeachable honesty and integrity, in the town of Hampton Falls, N. H. Some interest in mesmerism had been excited in the town, and it was discovered that Sanborn could very easily hypnotize or mesmerize Ira—a fact that astonished Sanborn himself as well as the neighbors who witnessed it; and in the hypnotic condition all the boy's stupidity and sluggishness at once disappeared, and he seemed quite another person; but strangest of all was his clairvoyant power, which seemed to be almost without limit. He described with perfect accuracy particular houses miles away, the people who lived in them, of whom he knew nothing; their occupation and amusements at any particular time when they happened to be the subjects of his observation.

Again, while he was in one room, blindfolded and under the observation of witnesses, a person in an adjoining room, with no windows, doors or any other kind of opening between, would hold up a book, fast closed, and Ira would be asked to read from a certain named page. No one present knew what was printed on that page, but he would begin to read slowly and carefully. On turning to the designated page it would be found that he had read correctly what was on that page.

The narrator of these incidents, Mr. W. W. Cramm, was 12 years old when they occurred, and he knew Ira, Mr. Sanborn and all the neighbors, but he would communicate nothing from his own recollection alone, but only such as were corroborated by his father, elder brother, and two or three trustworthy neighbors besides, all of whom had distinct recollection of the incidents related.

BOY BLINDFOLDED TELLS TIME.

Mr. Dean R. Tilton, next-door neighbor to Mr. Sanborn, relates the following incident: He went with Ira and Mr. Sanborn to Exeter one day to visit Commodore Long, who wanted to see Ira mesmerized. Ira's eyes were covered by a folded handkerchief over each eye, bound on by a third passed tightly around his head. After giving several proofs of his clairvoyance to the commodore, Mrs. Long came up to Ira, holding out her closed hand, back of her hand up, and asked him what was in it. He replied, "Watch." It was a small hunting-case one. She then asked him to tell the time through her hand. He immediately put the side of his forehead to the back of her hand and stated the time. No one present knew the time which it indicated, but on opening the watch it was found that he had named the exact hour and minute.

It is the easiest thing in the world to sneer at such a statement and declare it incredible or impossible; it would be much more to the purpose if those who dispose of the matter in this off-hand way would spend a little time in becoming intelligent regarding the matter and trying to ascertain the grounds upon which hundreds of most sensible, intelligent, and even scientific people believe in its truth.

ALEXIS DIDIER'S EXHIBITIONS.

Alexis Didier in the early fifties was astonishing Europe with his exhibitions of clairvoyance. The Paris correspondent of the New York Times in 1853 had an interview with Alexis at an American salon in Paris. Alexis of course was hypnotized and blindfolded. The correspondent reports that in playing ecarte, keeping the cards dealt to him in his left hand, he held the card he intended to play in his right, and he never once changed it upon the play of his partner. He knew his adversary's hand as well as his own, and he adds that the cards used were new, purchased by himself on his way to the interview. An acute skeptic who accompanied him had brought from his office a letter, inclosed in half a dozen envelopes, and he said he would believe if Alexis read the signature, and he did it. He took pencil and paper and wrote "Victor Dug—" He then exclaimed without finishing the last name, "C'est Victor Hugo." The envelopes were opened, and, sure enough, the signature of Victor Hugo was at the bottom of the letter. The H resembled a D, and Alexis had taken it for one until seeing the remaining letters enabled him to correct his mistake.

The genuineness of Alexis' clairvoyance has lately been a subject of discussion in the proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, and all the senseless quibbles of the skeptics were paraded—the possibility of collusion, the possibility of seeing under or over large wads of cotton nearly covering his face and tightly bound on, and other possibilities, all of which had been thoroughly canvassed time and again while the exhibitions were going on. To meet these insinuations, Alfred Russell Wallace, F. R. S., presented the account of Robert Houdin's experience with Alexis, as given in full by the Marquis de Merville. Houdin, the prince of conjurers, first attended to bandaging Alexis' eyes; then, sitting down at the table opposite him, he took from his pocket two packs of cards, still in their wrappers, with the government stamp intact. He opened a pack, shuffled, and asked Alexis to cut, which he did. He then dealt five cards to his opponent, who took good care not to touch them, and then dealt himself five. He was just going to take the cards up, when Alexis stopped him, saying, "You needn't do that; I take every trick," and then named every one of the ten cards as they lay on the table face downward.

"Let us begin again," said Houdin, stunned though he was as if by a blow.

"With pleasure," said Alexis.

Ten new cards were dealt.

"I discard," said Houdin.

"Why do you keep those two cards and that very weak trump?"

"Never mind," said Houdin; "give me three cards."

"Here they are."

"What are they?" said Houdin, covering them with both hands.

"Queen of diamonds, queen of clubs, eight of clubs."

A third round was told with the same accuracy.

"Splendid!" said Houdin.

HOUDIN SCOFFS AT A WARNING.

Houdin then tested him by having him read from a closed book at a certain page, which he did successfully.

He then produced a letter and gave it to Alexis, asking him if he could tell him in what street the writer then was. After four or five minutes Alexis wrote correctly the street and number.

"What is he doing at this moment?"

"Take care—he is betraying your confidence at this moment."

"That's an utter misfake," said Houdin. "The writer is one of my most trusted friends."

"Take care—he is deceiving you shamefully."

"Nonsense," said Houdin.

A few months later Houdin said to the Marquis:

"Do you remember the trial letter of my friend, shown to Alexis? Well, this wretched friend was robbing me of 10,000f. at the very time of the sitting."

Mme. Houdin was also present at the interview, closely watching everything. She also tested Alexis in reading her thoughts by holding her hand, with the most remarkable results.

"Well, how about juggiery?" Houdin was asked as he took his departure.

"Monsieur," said he, "if the world contains a juggler who could, as a juggler, perform such miracles, he would astonish me a thousand times more than the mysterious agent whom you have just shown me."

There is no space left for moralizing. The plain fact is that people, scientific or otherwise, who sneer at clairvoyance simply do not know modern psychology and the function of the sub-conscious mind.—Philadelphia Times.

OPERATED BY SPIRITS.

Strange Hauntings of Telegraph Wires.

Whes the subject of the supernatural comes up in a crowd of sensible people there are those who scoff loudly and declare such things ridiculous nonsense, and there are others who remain silent, remembering, perhaps, some weird experience of their own, in which things have occurred that defied all explanation and seemed actuated by an agency not of this world. Nearly everyone has had some experience which made his flesh crawl and for the nonce he has seriously questioned in his own mind the existence of some ghostly forces in the world about him.

There are times when one, no matter how skeptical, cannot help but feel the influence of his surroundings. Sitting in your own home, perhaps at 2 o'clock in the morning, after the cars have ceased to run; after the usual traffic in the streets has become stilled—it is then that the creaking of a shutter or the movement of some inanimate thing which may be caused by a thousand and one unknown, unlooked-for reasons, disturbs the nerves.

At such a time the rustling of a paper, the fall of an ash tray upon which you have recently placed a half-smoked cigar, or again, the sudden stopping of the clock, whose ticking seems companionable, any of these incidents, under certain surroundings, will cause the muscles to stiffen, the body to become erect, and place every nerve on the edge of expectancy for something we feel exists, rather than something we expect to see.

No one is exempt from a certain amount of superstition, no matter how strong our claims to the contrary. It is part of the legacy that comes to us from the dark ages when the whole world was full of it.

Among the stories of the supernatural that are to be entirely credited, so far as the impressions and the circumstances go, is one told by a telegraph operator in Kansas City and is vouched for by several other operators.

"One of the wires of the telegraph company extends between two large cities, passing through numerous smaller ones," the operator said. "It was in one of these that the phenomenon with which this story deals was first noticed. The operator was obliged to keep his office open until long after midnight. There is little doing telegraphically speaking, after midnight, as by that time the days business is generally all cleared up, and all that an operator is required to do is to kill time, or possibly now and then send some important message which requires an early delivery the following day.

"One evening last fall the early part of the night had been exceedingly tempestuous. The rain had fallen in torrents and no one ventured out who could possibly avoid it. About midnight the weather changed and the night became still, as is often the case after heavy rain storms. It was one of those nights when the atmosphere was so clear that every sound seems to penetrate the ear with twice the distinctness of ordinary times. The sound of the telegraph instrument resembled more the report of a small rapid-fire gun than the ordinary click with which we are all so familiar.

"It was perhaps 2:30 in the morning. The wires had been absolutely still for an hour; not a message was passing over them. The operator, tired and worn out, was dozing, his head against the table. Not a sound was to be heard within or without, when that keen sense of feeling which no one knows how to describe caused him suddenly to become wide awake. The instrument before him was perfectly still; there was no movement of either sounder or relay, yet from the wire he heard messages passing.

"The telegraphic characters which represent letters and words to operator were as plainly distinguishable as the shriek of a locomotive which was passing over the railroad several blocks away. He opened his key and called the operator in another town and asked him who was using the wire, but the other operator had heard nothing. As soon as the operators ceased talking and everything was still, the first operator heard again messages passing over the wire, yet there was no movement of any of his instruments.

"Every telegraph operator has what is called a 'sign,' that is, some letter, or perhaps, two letters, which he must make on every message he handles, in order that, should necessity arise, it can be learned which operator handled certain messages.

"Upon each of the messages which passed over the wire upon the night in question, causing no movement of the instruments, the operator plainly heard the letters 'EB,' which would indicate that the personal sign of the operator sending them was 'EB.'

"Other operators afterward filled positions in this same office, after the incident above related occurred, and each of them noticed the phenomenon. It was especially noticeable after a storm when the weather was extremely clear.

"There are people who say it was caused by induction from other wires strung upon the same route in close proximity, upon which an operator using the sign 'EB' was working. There are others who declare the wire is haunted, and the latter cannot be induced to accept a position in the town."—Kalamazoo Telegraph.

Victor Hugo a Profound Writer.

Was Victor Hugo a Spiritualist? Who can doubt it, after reading "The Man Who Laughs"? His books are permeated with thoughts of lofty grandeur. His characters are true to life. His stories are thrillingly interesting. Can a more pathetic end to almost superhuman toil and struggle, be imagined, than that of the hero in "Toilers of the Sea"? Can a more terrible character be imagined than Hans, in "Hans of Iceland"? And what a depth of love and devotion was in the soul of the hunchback of "Notre Dame." He wrote of the true love, and of the spiritual summons, in the "Man Who Laughs."

I write these lines as a spontaneous burst of admiration for the genius of a man who had such a profound insight into the workings of human passions. The pleasure which I derived from reading his books, is the incentive to this unmusical and totally inadequate eulogium. May he teach in the spirit spheres as he taught while a dweller on this earth.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD

A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

The Devil.

The following is of interest as an index of the progress made in biblical thought since the days when the devil was verily believed to be a veritable personage, coming in various guises, for the purpose of tempting and ruining humanity.

When their personal devil is set aside as a myth, it is easy for the "believer" to reject other and cognate notions that have been held and taught by theologians for many centuries past. With the personal devil goes the olden theory of the temptation, the fall of Adam and its consequences to the race; and so on and on, covering the whole realm of orthodox theology—for orthodox theology is dependent on the devil for its raison d'etre—the devil is its reason for existence.

It must be said, however, that the old abhorrent ideas about hell and the devil are gradually giving way before the growth of humanitarian sentiment, and at this time, though still embodied in the creeds, are really firmly believed by no intelligent people. The genuine believers are now restricted to such ranters as the "sanctified" "Holiness" evangelists and the more ignorant of the Salvation Army recruits.

But read what is advanced by one who has probably been reading along the lines of the "higher criticism" of the Bible, as reported in the Chicago Times-Herald:

"I hold that Milton, and not the Bible, is responsible for identifying the devil with the serpent in the Garden of Eden," said Rev. Edward H. Smith. Mr. Smith caused a lively discussion in the Oshkosh Ministerial Association by an assertion that there is no personal devil, and the idea that there is, like other conceptions of the human mind, is a result of evolution. He dealt with the question from a historical rather than a logical point of view.

"The serpent," he continued, "is nowhere called the devil in the Genesis story itself, and the only reference to such a supposed identification is in the apocalypse, which is a book of oriental allegory, where we read of that old serpent, the devil, there so named simply in reference to the assumed subtlety and cunning of his character.

"The story of the Garden of Eden is a parable with a basis of fact. The theory of those who read the story literally is that the serpent was the evil spirit in a serpent's form, but it is a theory that receives no warrant from the narrative itself, that is brought into it from without, and for which there is no scriptural authority.

"In the story the serpent is just what it is described to be, a mere animal made to talk for the purpose of conveying a lesson. It is only the poetic clothing or rendering of some profound truth which possibly could not be otherwise conveyed. There is nothing in the scriptures or out of them to compel us to read the story in any other way. Its whole force is lost if we put the temptation outside of man.

"In that story the serpent stands merely as a poetical symbol of the subtle pleading of man's lower nature against the higher law of his being, the yielding to which constitutes sin. It is allegory, not history; truth in symbol, not truth in literal historic fact; yet truth which is none the less true and none the less divinely true for being thus conveyed in allegoric form.

"It is admitted that there are passages in the Bible that, superficially read, do appear to encourage the idea of a personal devil. But those passages should be read and interpreted in the light of the inevitable conclusion of our own reason, and the study of the Bible as a literature, and not as a fragmentary collection of texts. In no other book should we think of reading such passages other than as poetic renderings of the truth they were designed to teach, and those truths would be no less true to us because it pleased the writer to put them in this form.

"There are, however, sources of this belief in a personal devil. It is traditional from the earliest ages of primitive man. Savage races, we are told, think to-day as all men thought once, before humanity had emerged from its original barbarism, and savage races to-day people the air with spirits, especially evil spirits or demons. In their ignorance of the working of natural laws, they imagine the lightning, the hurricane, famine, pestilence, to be the work of malevolent spirits, who must be propitiated.

"Such was the conception of primitive man. From the idea of evil spirits or demons in general, to the conception of a chief over them, one superior, and stronger than they, whose will they do, is only one step.

"It is true that the New Testament, especially that part which relates to the temptation of Christ, seems to support the popular idea of a personal devil. But Jesus nowhere himself ascribes his temptation to the devil in person. Tradition does that, but not Christ himself. It was inward, not outward, in the sphere of his own thoughts and feelings. It would seem from the historical point of view, not to say the rationalistic, that the idea of the devil stands not for a person, not for a demon, but for a principle."

"Love—Sex—Immortality." By Dr. W. P. Phelon. For sale at this office. Price, 25 cents.

"Meatless Dishes." Very useful. Price 10 cents.

Mercy and Spirituality

To the Editor:—It is always well to temper justice with mercy. In fact, one who is not actuated with that feeling, is not blessed with a high degree of Spirituality. The one who is not merciful, is never spiritual. A case in point is illustrated by Edith Sessions Tupper, in a New York daily:

The judge came slowly down the steps buttoning his gloves. At the bottom step he turned and looked back and up to the drawing room window.

There, framed in the background of misty, frost-like lace curtains, stood a charming young girl, who blew a kiss from the tips of her fingers to him.

The judge smiled and uncovered his iron gray head to his lovely daughter.

As he entered his waiting carriage and gave the order, "Stop at Dorley's," he again looked back and saluted the child whom he adored.

Father and daughter were devoted companions. The sweetest of all comradeships existed between them. She was his house-keeper, his chum, his intimate friend. Through all the trying and tragic scenes of his daily life her face was ever before him. Sometimes when he sentenced a criminal her sweet blue eyes looked in his and pleaded for mercy for the unfortunate.

Every morning the daughter pinned a flower in his coat, kissed him good-bye and then watched him from the drawing-room window. Every day the father stopped at a florist's and ordered the choicest flowers sent up to his child.

When he came home at night she stood in the window watching for him. And when he opened the hall door she received him in her loving arms, with the question, "Well, papa, have you been merciful to-day?"

And Judge Henry Saxton had come to be known to criminals and court employes as the "Easy Judge." But no one, save his few close friends, dreamed that the dominating influence and control of his life was vested in a mere slip of a girl.

Evenings it was her custom to read aloud to him. This was the delightful and sacred hour to which the Judge looked forward all day. In his luxurious library, before a glowing open fire, his weary head thrown back among the cushions of his arm chair, lazily enjoying the fragrance of his cigar, the Judge would sit, listening to the sweet voice—the voice that so reminded him of another, long since hushed in death.

Just now the daughter was reading Shakespeare's comedies to him. Last night it had been "Merchant of Venice." He recalled the accents of her voice as she had read:

The quality of mercy is not strained.
It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath. It is twice blest;
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes.

And then he thought how she had looked across the table at him with her serious eyes and said, roguishly and yet earnestly: "Now, papa, you are to remember that all day to-morrow."

The Judge smiled gently and tenderly touched the flower in his coat. He was remembering.

The court room was crowded. The seats were packed with rows of the usual hangers-on, supplemented to-day by many well-known people. It was the day on which Judge Saxton was to deliver his charge to the jury in the famous Appleton-Tremaine case.

The whole miserable, wretched story had been rethreshed. The unfortunate man, once condemned to the chair for murdering the pretty wayward Tenderloin girl, had undergone his second ordeal. His devoted wife had sat by him throughout the trial and had listened unshrinkingly to the dreadful details of her husband's liaison with the frail butterfly creature whose life he was accused of having crushed out.

The zealous District Attorney had loosened all his batteries against the prisoner, and the eminent counsel for the defense had pleaded and explained and begged for clemency.

It now remained for the learned Judge to deliver the final solemn instructions to the twelve haggard-faced men in the box and then the last act in this drama of love, hatred, jealousy and revenge would be at its finish.

But the trial was to be interrupted this morning by the sentencing of a batch of convicted prisoners. One after another, the sullen, hopeless, defiant, despairing criminals were brought up to the bar to listen to the words which shut them away from their fellow beings for years.

"It's mighty lucky yes were," said more than one officer to his prisoner, "that yez were before the Easy Judge. If it had been Judge Cleveland, now, yez would have got it in the neck."

There came to the bar two women. One was young, not more than seventeen. Her face was pretty, but brazen. Her eyes, blue as violets, stared at the Judge with an expression at once of terror and defiance. She wore a tawdry coat, cheaply imitative of the finery of ladies. Her hair was in a bushy tangle of curls over her ears in that outrageous fashion affected by many young girls.

She had made a brave attempt to be smart by daubing her cheeks with rouge and sticking a bedraggled feather in her shabby Tam-o'-Shanter cap. Altogether she was a sad and sickening sight. And she looked so young.

By her side stood a woman, plainly dressed in black, a woman with a serene, kind face and gray hair, one of those good women whose lives are spent in ameliorating the conditions surrounding prisoners. Her face was fixed imploringly upon the Judge.

The Judge regarded the prisoner marked the reddened cheeks, the poor, flashy finery, the stubborn, frightened, rebellious face.

"She is so young," kept beating in his brain. "Why, she must be just about the age——"

"What is the charge?" he asked coldly.

An officer glibly explained, "Grand larceny, Your Honor."

"Have you anything to say why sentence should not be passed?" the Judge addressed the girl.

She made no answer, but gazed sullenly at the floor.

"May I speak, Your Honor?"

It was the good angel at the girl's side. His Honor gravely inclined his head.

"It is her first offense," faltered the kind soul. "She was foolish and frivolous and was tempted by her love of finery, but oh, sir, she is so young! I beg—"

But the good woman could go no further. Her voice died away. Something choked her. She put her hand to her throat, and the tears ran down her face.

The Judge suddenly covered his face with his hand.

Then an intense silence settled upon the courtroom. People gazed, awe-stricken, at the bench. Reporters looked up from their table to see what the impressive stillness meant. A big policeman looked out the window and covertly blew his nose.

His Honor was weeping.

Yes, there was no doubt of it. Through the fingers of his strong, well shaped white hand tears, like the gentle rain from heaven, slowly trickled down his face.

"She is so young; she is so young."

Over and over these words repeated themselves. "Just about the age"— He saw again that sweet, refined, flower-like face, he heard the earnest words, "Now, papa, you are to remember that all day to-morrow."

The Judge wiped his eyes and controlled his emotion. A sigh of relief ran through the court-room. The girl at the bar was troubled and ashamed. She began to tremble. The good Samaritan at her side put her arm about her.

His Honor cleared his throat.

"In consideration of the youth of this unfortunate girl, I will suspend sentence and remand the prisoner in the custody of this excellent woman."

The oldest lawyers all agreed that never before had they listened to so masterly a charge as that given by Judge Saxton in the Appleton-Tremaine case. The evidence was so startling, so sensational, it had presupposed the prisoner's guilt. Until the opening sentences of His Honor's charge every one in the courtroom had decided on a verdict of "Guilty."

But the Judge with that marvelous dexterity, that keen knowledge of the law, that astonishing acumen for which he was distinguished, deftly sifted and weighed the evidence, carefully sorted the true from the false, admonished the men who hung on his words and jealously guarded the rights of the accused.

"Strong in favor of the prisoner," was the cautious whisper that passed from lip to lip.

When His Honor rose to charge the jury, his eyes rested for an instant on the prisoner's hopeless face, bleached by long confinement in Sing Sing's death chamber, and bearing traces of horror that could never be obliterated. Then with one swift glance the Judge marked the face of the prisoner's wife. She was a young woman, but her hair was gray. Suffering had laid its ifon fingers on her countenance and her soul—her blameless, loyal soul—looked from its windows with appealing, helpless misery.

"How would she look if she were happy?" thought His Honor as he faced the expectant jury. And then a sudden mental convulsion shook him. What if he were to live to see such a look as that on his own daughter's face?

"Papa, papa, be merciful," rang a voice as sweet as a silver bell. "You are to remember this all day to-morrow and be merciful."

His Honor was remembering.

When the white-haired foreman stood up in the jury box and in a voice choked with emotion said "Not guilty!" when that woman with the pallid face and terror-stricken eyes, who had risen with the prisoner to hear his sentence, turned and flashed one never to be forgotten look at the Judge, His Honor softly repeated to himself, "It blesseth him that gives and him that takes."

The carriage stopped and as the Judge descended he looked up at the drawing-room window. Yes, there she stood, the exquisite girl for whose sake and under whose influence he had taken coinpassion that day on two wretched women.

The door was opened and into the genial warmth, the soft mellow light, the loving embrace, he was tenderly drawn, while a soft voice murmured in his ear as a pair of soft lips touched his cheek, "Well, papa dear, have you been good and merciful to-day?"

In all the affairs of life, whether public or private, the first step to take to become spiritual is to be merciful, as well as truthful. Spiritualists and mediums everywhere should heed this divine lesson.

THE CELESTIAL CHOIR.

Unique Music in the Mountain Solitude.

It sometimes happens that by a peculiar combination of circumstances nature produces most unexpected and novel effects, as if she were embodying the most delicate sentiments in her work and clothing it with all the expression of poetry. In these noted efforts she more frequently appeals to the eye than to the ear; and though the song of birds is sweet and cheering, they never rival the brilliancy and diversity of color of the flowers.

If we could hear the roses sing, what entrancing music would stir our souls.

Through the sense of hearing I had one experience in the Rocky Mountains that was weird and impressive and the like of which it is probable no other mortal ever enjoyed or marveled at. It occurred far above timber line—the locality an absolute solitude, where not a bird twittered to break the silence. I was alone. The day was warm and bright, the sky as blue as a violet, and not a breeze stirring to disturb the sleep that the hills seemed wrapped in. I was prospecting for ores and was entering the mouth of a horseshoe shaped valley about two miles long and a mile wide at its center. From the bottom of this the mountain sides, which were composed of clean broken-up rock, rose abruptly around the elliptical inclosure. The little valley appeared like a grand amphitheater designed by nature for some great dramatic performance, and I instinctly looked around for the titans that were to celebrate some sublime spectacle in the history of nature, and who might well select for the play this appropriate environment. The rock facing the hillsides was quite finely broken and wholly of the variety called phonolite; which name is descriptive of its nature, being derived from the greek words phonos, sound; and lithos, a rock; for this peculiar silicious formation is very sonorous; and if a piece of it be struck with a hammer it will give out a clear ringing note like a piece of musical glass.

It was three p. m. when I entered the valley, and already the sun was beginning to have an oblique shadow across the upper end of it. Presently I began to hear a sweet combination of sounds that appeared to have a far-away origin and that grew louder and more distinct as I neared the center of the valley, which appeared to focalize and accentuate the flowing melody that now seemed to come out of the very sky. I was exceedingly puzzled.

Was it possible I was catching the echoes of the hosannas that were ringing out from the Holy City?

I looked into the blue depths from which the music seemed to issue, but could discern nothing.

The music was soft but distinct, and would slightly change its center of origin as if a band of celestials were moving through the air and making the notes as they traveled.

I was not superstitious, and I determined to discover the cause of this marvelous phenomenon.

I had to cross the valley a number of times before an explanation could be arrived at. In the thin air of the greatest heights the radiation of the sun's heat is very rapid and the mere stepping from clear sunlight into shadow will cause a perceptible chill. The midday sun had heated up the millions of pieces of phonolite and had slightly expanded them; the moment the sun ceased to shine on the rock it immediately cooled and contracted, and this motion would cause the pieces to scrape over or slide on the contiguous rock and produce vibrations that were in unison and these acting together gave forth the musical notes that I at first attributed to the celestial choir.

No music that I have ever heard has so profoundly stirred me or so excited my interest as that of the awful solitude of Choir Valley.

Prophetic Indications.

It is a hopeful indication when men in the pulpit can use the plain language uttered by Bishop Fallows, on a recent Sunday. His remarks were called out by the present strike of the coal miners, and he said among other things, as reported in the Chicago Chronicle:

"Men who profess and call themselves Christians are amassing wealth by methods which are decidedly unChristian. They are gaining it by the underpaid labor of thousands of men and women and even little children. They are building palatial residences furnished with a splendor unknown in all history, while those who have created their fortunes are huddled together like sheep or swine in numberless instances, in hovels unworthy the name of human habitations, or else they are toiling in conditions that take all the joy and inspiration out of life. Nay, life itself by its hopefulness has become for them a gambler's desperate chance.

"Christian men will do as members of a corporation what they would not do as individuals. I cannot conceive of any Christian who would ask the great body of miners in the anthracite region to work for him at the mere pittance they are receiving. But associated with others in great combinations which have no soul, no conscience, no justice, he will tacitly or openly permit a strike to be made which shall involve the interests of 150,000 men and their children.

"The message of the church to-day to such men of wealth is 'Cease to do evil—learn to do well.' Continue to use your gains to endow libraries, universities and hospitals, but cease paying starvation wages to the laborer. Give him what belongs to him justly that he may put books and music and education and sunshine and comfort in his home. It is more justice and not benevolence that the world needs and that the church demands."

Such talk is of healthful tendency, and there is need for more of it, and not alone in the churches.

A current of ethical thought is manifest in an article in one of the magazines in which the writer expresses his views to the effect that our millionaires show a conspicuous lack of originality when it comes to disposing of the wealth they have accumulated. They seem incapable of devising any benefaction other than the hackneyed one of founding libraries or endowing colleges and universities.

The modern trend in these directions, however, is not to be deprecated entirely; it shows an unrest of spirit that is hopeful and, indeed, prophetic of other and better results in time to come. These benefactions show that there is a feeling that it is wrong to amass enormous wealth to gratify a mere instinct of greed; that the wealth of the world justly belongs to its producers, in equity, and that there is a wrong involved in the inequitable distribution of the wealth produced, among the wealth-producers.

This working of the ethical sentiment of equity, is an evolutionary factor which will eventually produce captains of industry who will in their hearts yield assent to the ethical principle that the truest philanthropy, the ideal benefaction, is that which gives the laborer, as nearly as can be done, in equity between the factors involved in production, the full result or equivalent of his labor.

When that time comes in the evolution of social justice, no millionaire will give laborers inadequate wages, thus amassing wealth, and then make an ostentatious show of philanthropy with money unjustly withheld from labor.

Altruism will manifest itself at the foundation, in equitable distribution of labor's products where the same rightly belongs.

Educational endowments are good, but justice and equity—the application of ethics to social conditions in this world—are better.

And it must not be forgotten that Spiritualism with its cardinal principle of the vital brotherhood of humanity for time and eternity, with its co-ordinate principle of the unity of interests of all humanity, will be a potent factor in the evolution of man, through higher ideals, to that higher ethical standard of the man of the future, which is most surely foreshadowed and prophesied by these outcroppings of modern tendencies, which are indicative of an innate element of manhood, pushing man forward to higher, nobler and purer life than the mere amassing of worldly riches.

BIBLE LITERATURE.

It Is Neither Good Style, Good Poetry, nor Good Sense.

To the Editor:—Pardon a little criticism of what seems to be a very prevalent opinion regarding the literature of the Bible. It is a common thing for people who can find no other redeeming quality of the Bible, and don't want to be hard on it, to offer some apology for its existence—praise its literary qualities. In The Progressive Thinker of August 2 is a fair sample, under the caption, "The Bible Chemically Analyzed." A quotation from the same reads as follows:

"The National Educational Association, in session at Minneapolis, passed a resolution expressive of its hope and wish that public sentiment would permit the Bible to be read and studied in the public schools generally, but simply as a literary work of the highest and purest type, side by side with the poetry and prose which it has inspired and in large part formed."

Now, in all candor, I ask for information—as so many claim to find rare gems of literature in the Bible—where may some of them be found? It is certainly verbose in the extreme, and in nearly every chapter violates every rule of twentieth century grammar.

Is it possible we are retrograding in a literary sense? I am informed that the first Bibles were written without vowels or division of words; and that later it was rewritten, and fixed up, so as to be readable (if not sensible), and since then has been revised again and again, and yet the only defense offered or that can be offered for much of it, is to deny that it means what it says; and there are hundreds, if not thousands of different interpretations of its meaning. Hundreds of churches are founded on these different understandings; and every once in a while a preacher is kicked out of his church for finding still a new meaning for some of its meaningless passages.

What would be thought of a book of the present day that would be interpreted in a thousand different ways?

Take a common five-cent novel, and let a thousand people read it, and all will understand it alike because it is in every way a thousand times better literary production than the Bible; and while it lays no claim to truth, it records nothing but what might be true, or might possibly have happened. On the contrary, the Bible records many things that everybody knows never have happened. A good 20th century novel, both as a literary production and a teacher of good morals, is a thousand times better than the Bible.

I venture to say, if the grand old Progressive Thinker was to adopt the literary style of the Bible, it would not live six months. Brother Frances doubtless could get it up in Bible style, but he would require sixteen pages instead of eight on which to print it. It is not because the present-day authors cannot imitate the literature of the Bible, but because they have too much common sense to do it.

It is claimed there are fine gems of poetry in the Bible. I may not know what poetry is; anyway I fail to find one single verse of poetry in the whole text of the Bible. Some one has re-arranged the Psalms and transposed the wording so as to make a kind of doggerel poetry of them, but nothing to compare with what we find week after week in our common newspapers, and especially in The Progressive Thinker.

There Is No Death.

There is no death. A form grows with each passing soul on earth
That leaves it at the grave when taking on a higher birth,
Just hands it back to earth again and thanks her for the loan,
And passes on to spheres beyond. The earth receives her own;
And through the crucible of change, in time unfolds again,
Refined, the protoplasmic stuff for other men.

There is no death. The sobs and sighs and hearts bowed down in grief
Are but results of false and crude and ignorant belief,
But when a friend or loved one goes beyond our mortal view
We call it death and leave it so for want of something new.
We see them pass from sight and know so little where they go
We call it death; and yet the gates are swinging to and fro.

There is no death. We know the forms of loved ones are at rest,
Though burned or 'neath the ground with hands across the breast,
We know the places held by them on earth are vacant now,
For as the coffin lid closed down above the form, somehow
We lost the touch, we lost the voice of some one that we love—
We hear them say, "There is no death;" your loved ones are above."

How Good Are We?

Spiritualism is a tough proposition in more ways than one. Let us look into a few of its knurly problems for awhile.

In the first place the foundation of Spiritualism is the manifestation, and without which it would only be a belief, a faith, built up from the inner senses, the hope, the dreams that this life is not all.

Manifestation is the principle or proposition that is a tough one for the scientists to analyze or prove satisfactory even to themselves, it is too deep for them. One part of this foundation rests upon a shore they cannot reach with their implements of analysis, it is too obscure from their mortal vision for them to take its measurements; it is beyond the comprehension of the most wise; they are often led to say it is beyond them.

In the second place, it is a tough proposition for the theologian, who has taught that there were manifestations in ancient times, but none at present, only that which is of the Devil, for it did not come through the church. They have fought it, they have maligned it and covered it with all the filth of their wrathful tongues, and have simply made it grow.

It is a tough proposition for the agnostic who closes his eyes and says, "I see nothing in it," but hopes it is true, and points to the fraud as though that were all; as though the imitation did not indicate something to imitate; as though there was nothing of value in knowing the soul's immortality, in knowing that this short life does not end all.

But the toughest proposition is for the leaders in Spiritualism, the thinkers, the workers to shape the world to a condition of reconciliation with the change from the old to the new, and to hold back the deluge of humbuggery that has grown up through the commercial side of Spiritualism. We are moving along with the load upon our shoulders while the spirit hosts are turning the searchlight upon our pathway and urging us forward.

The proposition of the day is not how many members have we, and how much money have they; but how good are we? How true? How loyal?

"Spiritualism a fact," will rise above "Spiritualism a fraud;" in fact stands above it now, but must rise up out of the mire of human selfishness and commercialism, out of the greed and passion that have come to us with the drift of the world that is floating between ignorance and wisdom, between superstition and science, that is moving along with the current of earth life; "to gain and to hold."

Spiritualism must be a reform, always has been a reform, and will in time turn her powers upon her own band of workers. It is best to keep track of the interior as well as the exterior and ulterior. No disparagement or accusation is here meant, for Spiritualism will stand comparison morally and intellectually with the rest of the world, but we know we can be better, and knowing it is the foundation upon which to build.

How good are we? All other propositions are secondary and auxiliary to this, but they are wheels within and useful to the machinery of operation. By keeping this thought before us we are bound to grow and eliminate the element that seems to be holding our cause down to the level of the bickering and trafficking commercial world, where greed and humbuggery are swinging along hand in hand.

"How Good am I?" If these words could be posted upon every bulletin board in the land what a grand result might be obtained through its suggestive power.

If, when we rise in the morning we ask ourselves this question, and when we go about our business in the day and retire at night, we repeat the words over again it would do more to make the world better than all the long-drawn prayers that go up from the Christian world, because it will produce a retrospective glance into one's selfhood. "How Good am I?"

Antagonistic Systems.

A very instructive tableau is presented to the American people, and to the world at large, by the attitude of the convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies, held in this city last week. It is all anent the friars and the school question in the Philippine Islands, and incidentally the school system of the United States.

Bishop McFaul accused the administration of introducing a "de-christianizing" school system in place of the Catholic schools.

This, of course, simply indicates that the American system of secular public schools is being substituted for the Romish system of education. Of course the intensely Romish partisans will howl over this plan, for the main idea of the Romish schools is to teach "the Christian religion," by which is meant Romanism.

Bishop Muldoon, of Chicago, as reported, said that it was the right of Catholics to demand their rights from the government. He insisted that the Catholics should have a pro rata allowance from the taxes, for the establishment of parochial schools.

Catholic parochial schools can have no other reason for existence than the inculcation of religion as expressed in and by the Roman Catholic church. That is the primal object had in view by those who favor their establishment —to give the children a Romish education. This brings to view the wide difference between the Romish idea of schools and education, and the American idea.

Between the American idea and Roman Catholic idea there is an antagonistic divergence that can never be reconciled or made to harmonize.

The idea of the Romanists is to Romanize, above all else.

The American idea is to give to all an education of a secular character, without the introduction into the schools of the religious teachings of any any class, sect or cult whatever.

The Romish idea is to teach religion (Romanism) at the public expense. The American idea is that religious teaching is solely a matter for the churches, and not to be be at the public expense.

The Romish idea is to dominate governments, religion, education, everything.

The American idea is entire separation of church and state, free non-churchly education in public schools, and equal rights for all, of whatever sect or church, or of no religious beliefs or affiliations.

The Tribune on Kinsman's Discovery.

It is discouraging to observe that one Mr. Kinsman, an expert biblical student of Erie, Pa., has been carefully investigating the old and new testaments, and after going through the Bible from lid to lid comes to the conclusion that no women get to heaven, as he finds no reference to them as being in the celestial regions. Further than that, although we frequently characterize persons of the other sex as angels, the characterization has no celestial significance. They are merely earthly angels. Mr. Kinsman finds no record of feminine angels in heaven. In every case the angel is a man, specifically defined by the masculine pronoun. Mr. Kinsman's discovery is by no means new. Other scholars have observed the same strange silence in the Bible as to women in heaven, but they have been so pained by the discovery that they have kept quiet about it, being in doubt what effect upon the sex a proclamation of it would have.

Mr. Kinsman also professes to be troubled over this discovery, old as it is, but he comforts himself with another discovery which may possible be new. At least no one has yet announced it, we believe. He finds no evidence in the Bible that women go to the other place. From one point of view this is comforting, but it is not entirely satisfactory. It also suggests a harassing perplexity, for if women do not go to heaven and do not go to the other place, where do they go? Mr. Kinsman is also troubled about this and expresses a doubt whether it will ever be known.

It is not likely that he will be allowed to have the last word. Of course, there are no women in the other place, but it is not safe to assume there are none in the celestial world until the other and interested side has been heard from. If Mr. Kinsman will apply to Miss Anthony, or Mrs. Stanton, or to the Chicago Woman's Club he will have his doubts speedily resolved and find that in the next world, if not in this, woman has just as much of glory as man and just as large a representation among the higher intelligences—probably larger, for the Bible affirms it was man, not woman, who was created "a little lower than the angels." The inference as to woman is clear enough.

Another Journey in Spirit Realms.

BLUE—INSPIRATION.

Next we entered what seemed to be a room, but without support, covering or protection of any description save the delicate blue of the soft atmosphere. They, like the occupants of the grade we had just parted from, were so occupied that they did not seem to notice our entrance; and I note that after leaving the vivid orange ray I had not seen myself, but while I was intensely conscious of my divine ego, its dress was now so much a part of its surroundings that all personality was gone and only vitalized individuality remained.

Here I observed my same youth whom I had left in the green ray, sitting at a desk with loosely clasped hands, and with the same intense concentration manifest, he was gazing into his open palms. I floated silently behind him and, drawn by his concentration, I too gazed into his open hands, and through my whole being began to throb that vibratory thrill which I feel in earth life when the cup of divine inspiration is placed to my lips. Soon I saw fluttering in his hands a rosy mist, and with intense stillness we waited and slowly, in all its wondrous, glorious beauty an unfolding rose lay in his hand—the result of his unfoldment into the knowledge of the Power within.

I was not conscious that he observed our entrance, but without one look of surprise he handed me the flower, with this unspoken message, "It is for her whom we love;" and I recognized my brother and all the beauty of his education was unfolded before me. His earth life from force of circumstances was entirely changed from what he had desired it to be, and I saw in his soul's inventive work simply the unfoldment of his mechanical earth genius, and was so rejoiced to find him in my Master's charge. The reason he has not returned to earth oftener is on account of his not yet completed education; for the better way to communicate is by bringing the earth loved ones to the spirit spheres, thereby elevating the earth souls and not retarding the growth of the spirit souls, as it does when by our cries and importuning we call them from, perhaps, their seasons of necessary rest or study.

O, earth mothers, you are the cause of the most trouble. Out of your great mother love you are sometimes cruelly selfish, crying and demanding that the little souls should arise from their downy beds of rest, warmth and life-giving strength, and return to the darkness and coldness of earth conditions just to dry the tears that are not shed for your darlings, but for your own loneliness. Rather with prayer, fasting and good deeds, fit yourselves so that even while yet in the earthly covering the door may be opened, and inside the mystic portals you can receive a glimpse of the perfect and loving system exercised for all souls entering into the new life; for not until they have mastered their own souls' growth are they fitted to become teachers or even to return to earth life.

In this same delicate blue ray I observed artists busily engaged, and one woman drew my attention as did my brother; and for what follows I have no explanation to offer. I myself have not up to this time solved what seems to be a mystery, but as time explains all the lessons I have ever received, I am content to know, the Master leads. I followed the motion of the artist's swiftly swaying hands, and saw grow upon the canvas a sandy stretch of sea beach, and the waves came gently and caressingly up to the feet of a woman standing with uplifted hand, shading her eyes from the vivid but fleeting glories of a southern sunset. Still the artist hand swept back and forth like one entranced, and I saw the features of the woman grow upon the canvas. I gazed upon the fair artist and upon her creation, and I saw that with exception of the fact that one was a glorious blonde and the other a true daughter of the south, with her mass of blue black locks and great, dark, soulful eyes, they were identically the same—the same turn of the hand, the same curve of the lip, the same droop of the eye, and the same radiant smile shone from cloudless blue and storm-swept black orb.

The artist's hand did not touch the canvas, but by the force of her own soul's concentration she was doing what in earth language we would describe as picturing inspirationally what was within.

I asked, "What is the meaning of all this?" And as I did I again saw my own soul and saw that I, neither blonde nor brunette, was still a combination of the two—three in one—and I read this lesson: That we take upon ourselves the expression of the inner. In days of gladness and beauty we actually fashion beautiful expressions of it in our daily life; in days of sadness and despondency our souls actually take on its condition, and while still beautiful, for the soul when seen is ever beautiful, still it stands upon a lonely stretch of sand watching the going down of its sun, feeling the sadness and loneliness of an ocean-swept life, without a bird, beast or human in sight.

The fair artist arose and said, "I will try to be like unto thee, busy, useful and sunny, and if it is only to give a smile I will realize it is doing its work."

She spoke, and as the low, vibrant tones of her voice fell upon the atmosphere the whole air seemed to roll in sonorous grandeur; space was annihilated; all, all was filled with the glorious sweetness of her voice, low and musical, but permeating my whole being until only she existed—gone, past, no future expected, only one full, throbbing, pulsating drop of the present standing out for all ages to come alone, her message to all women, to all motherhood—"I am a soul that has conquered. I will soon leave for my last incarnation. I am almost ready for my last work upon earth, and that is to bring two souls together while yet in the mortal and have them fully realize the grandeur of their own souls, untainted by one ray of earth condition. Thou canst help me, O Child of the Nile. In the heart of the Lotus lily I found thee; long hast thou wandered, but thy source is so pure that thy return to us must be like unto it. Lift up thy hands, O Egypt, and out from a woman's soul let the God spring full-born chanting its song of triumph. Let the Gods Osiris and Isis hide their heads behind the voluptuous veil of a sensuous past, and let all men to know that all the pyramids that ever rang back the hosannas of a mighty race are as one grain of sand upon the shore compared to the power of a conquered soul. Dynasties tremble and fade, nations rise and fall, earths grow cold and die, but a soul lives on, growing stronger and grander forever."

Swept along by the tide of her glorious inspiration, I found myself standing with a white-robed throng under the dark indigo rays of a midnight sky.

INDIGO—SILENCE.

Silently they moved to and fro with clasped hands and radiant, self-illumined faces which they often raised toward the star-gemmed zenith as though in its silent depths they were seeking to read some great lesson. Backward they glanced and saw the grades through which they had advanced up to the present knowledge of their own souls, and as the grand depth of the mysterious heavens breathed its wonderful power over them, Divine Love began to unfold and the desire to be of use to those weaker than themselves sprang full born in their breasts; and like a glorious panorama the school and its great lessons were unrolled before them. They saw the little, weak, unfolding ones in the grade of the red ray, and as they gazed upon their helplessness an intense desire to be of some help to them grew until, as I watched, I saw numbers coming and going from the red, orange and yellow rays, and I observed, what I had not noticed before, that beside the cot of each unfolding red-ray soul stood one of the inmates of the indigo ray, while a mother love seemed to hallow each fair face, male and female, alike.

Once more my guide spoke: "Here we find many of our teachers, and they are allowed to minister to spirit souls before they are strong enough to act as teachers to earth souls. And some, even after they have passed through the seventh grade or violet ray, are not yet strong enough, so back to the first grade or red ray they must go and once more through the course.

"The repugnance which the human soul has towards turning backward is implanted there as a propelling force to push it onward. As all life is in circles or cycles, a seeming backward turn of the wheel must take place; but as all circles or cycles are in spiral form, we are ever, though passing over past ground, one grade higher. Here we also have the souls who, having passed through all stages of the lower or darker spheres of life, realize after many and all lessons have been learned that the greatest lesson is one of silence; also those who have stood on the topmost pinnacle of fame and are willing to be forgotten if only they obey the law of God. Ye would-be scoffers of a God, with your petty misconceptions of life, read in the history of these dwellers the littleness of your thoughts; know that in overcoming all the littleness of life, you attain a conception of its greatness.

"Here we find the souls who in the silence of the night come unheard and unknown and by the bedside of weary ones soothe the tossing, sin-sick souls with whispers. Unknown and unrecognized they stand by the hungry, longing souls under the deep blue of a midnight sky and whisper such grandeur of thought that the very well-spring of joy seems to bathe the souls with life-giving power. Here we find the spirits who watch, unseen and unknown, over the vilest haunts of man and fan the smouldering fire of divinity that it may not be entirely extinguished. Here we find in literal form the spirits who are the vestal virgins of mythological lore. They have learned that the greatest glory is in doing, is in the act, and not reward, and silently they ever work; here we find the Masters of Theosophical thought; here we find the guardian angel of Catholicism, the nameless ones, learning the great lesson of self abnegation. Up to this time all growth has been toward the seeming glory of the personality of the individual; now the step must be taken of laying down seeming, and taking up being—laying down personality and taking up individuality.

"One more lesson, and then back to earth, O Child of my soul."

Then from my soul broke forth a prayer—"O God, if I be worthy, take me to thy great school of learning and teach me some new and needed lesson."

VIOLET—DIVINE LOVE.

She came to me, the purple-robed, golden-haired Mother, and said unto me: "Cease thy struggling; fold thy arms serenely; thou hast received the pearl of great price. Christ dwelleth in thy heart, for thou dost love humanity. Now put into practice what thou hast attained."

Three figures then appeared in the heavens, "clothed with the sun." I bowed at their feet, dazzled with their splendor. One placed over me a soft silken covering, and then they all faded into the heavens. I took my veil, and passing it over my face I became luminous and a brilliancy like unto the three suffused my whole being.

Then He came, Her son, the purple-robed, golden-haired Mother. We walked upon the great stream of life. He bade me not be afraid; my trust was complete; I knew He could walk the waters—He would bear me up. We crossed the stream of life and stepped upon the shore of not springing grass, but tiny shoots of flame. We passed safely on and came to the steps of a great temple, where, in a massive censer, a living fire was ever kept burning. We entered. The great temple was built in octagon shape, its massive columns rearing their glittering whiteness up, up, until their crested tops seemed to be lost in the depths of a vast blue dome, which I at first thought was built over it, but which in the light of future revealments I saw was the royal mantle of the heavens' blue. This temple had no walls—only the great columns in octagon shape. A foundation for the feet was there, built of the seven colors laid in hexagon form. In the center a great circle of snowy white appeared like the walls of a massive fountain, and two steps of dazzling whiteness led up. We advanced, and I expected to see a great basin of pure, deep, blue water, but as my feet touched the last step a column of fire sprang up into the vaulted dome, and as its heavy belching smoke arose I saw then that my temple had only the zenith for a roof. As the smoke arose and spread its great black cloud, it took the form of a monstrous bird and its wings stretched from center to circumference. With a mighty rush that seemed to shake the heavens, it passed from sight, and the mounting fire climbed higher and higher and its flames seemed to leap and plunge with God-given intelligence.

He said, "Enter; thou art not afraid?" I answered, "No; even if my outer covering doth perish, spirit is all and eternal, and I cannot be destroyed." He smiled. I entered—spirit emerged. The great column of fire was gone, and, as spirit gazed, in its place appeared an immense revolving, vibrating globe with only one-half of it visible at a time, like unto an inverted dome. It had the appearance of an etherealized ball of mercury. It moved with such rapidity that it seemed almost stationary. Every particle of which it was composed was a tiny atom, a perfect electric sphere, pulsating in a liquid sea of electricity. As spirit gazed, all the cities of the earth-world were pictured to her view, and all the peoples thereon, and herself as she appeared when the purple-robed, golden-haired Mother spoke unto her. She saw that her prayer to the most high was recorded in the temple, that He heard and hears every heavenward aspiration; and spirit knew that her cry or prayer was answered when He was sent to meet her upon the road.

To that temple the great ones go, and if into the holy of holies a cry has penetrated from earth, some one goes who is known to the hungry, God-seeking soul. If spirit had lived near the Buddha tree, the great and good Buddha would have met her out upon the sea of life; if the dark-hued Turk had been her sire, Mohammed would have come in kingly grandeur; if the celestial city of China's sea washed shore had been her birthplace, Confucius in all his stately dignity would have answered her cry to God. But as spirit had dwelt among the fair-skinned Saxon race for a time, the white man's highest messenger of a living God heard the cry and came to meet her upon the way and taught her how all the deeds of men are known in the Most High. Spirit learned that this great electric dynamo was the result of the concentration of the great ones from every part of earth's sphere; that from every nation and every time, ere Egypt reigned in youthful beauty, ere the sphinx and obelisks reared the landmarks of undying thought, ere the shores of Galilee recorded the foot-prints of the humble fisherman, this temple was, is and ever will be "not made by hands, eternal in the heavens."

Footnote by Author.—This journey was taken the 18th day of October, Friday, 10 a. m., 1901. Just nine months ago to-day, the 18th day of July, Friday, 10 a. m., 1902, the key to my temple was handed to me by Hudson Tuttle in his glorious book, Religion of Man and Ethics of Science, page 99.

I bow before thee, O great Father and Mother God; I enter thy temple with reverent tread; the mystery of the ages I Am. Down the locked doors of the past one more bolt is drawn and the dim corridors are becoming illuminated, windows thrown open to the glorious sunlight, cobwebs swept away, dust the accumulation of ages is being brushed from their flagstones, and man is walking there, inbreathing the pure air of his own divinity.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning." Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

KNOWLEDGE.

A Brief Study of Religious Bases.

The great problem of life, as it presents itself to view for inspection and thought, in all its various conditions and organized departments, is one continued, unceasing, anxious, selfish struggle for a present and a future state of existence.

We see this demonstrated from every point; turn which way we may, go where we will, we see this gigantic struggle going on continually. It is emblazoned on every bush, creature, or human being, in strong living characters, not to be slightly ignored; and so naturally and so firmly is this life principle implanted in all Universal Nature, that eradication is an impossibility.

In the vegetable kingdom we see this struggle verified continually, the superior overshadowing and crowding upon the inferior. In the animal kingdom, regardless of the inherent rights of others, we see the strongest overpowering and crushing the weaker, continually striving for the mastery, and the prolongation of life, at the expense of the weaker. And in the human being this element is by no means slumbering, but is one continual struggle to preserve life, and to secure a knowledge of the perpetuity of existence, not only here upon this earth plane, but after we have passed the portals of what is called death, and have passed through the gate into another sphere of existence; and no opportunity is neglected, no task too irksome, no sacrifice too great, so that we gain the much-wished-for and coveted finality.

But to give an explanation of the great and universal law of life is beyond the ability of mortal man; all we can say is, that we exist, that we believe life always existed, uncreated, and is of eternal duration, consequently as a result, reasoning from cause to effect, it always will exist.

Millions of people in ages past, and on down to the present time, have been continually endeavoring to enlighten themselves and mankind on this principle of eternal life, through the attributes of a God, and yet are as ignorant, and in as much midnight darkness in arriving at a correct solution of the mysterious problem as when the first began.

Now we judge all outward appearances by our internal faculties; if they fail us and are unequal to the task imposed, we remain in the same ignorant bliss. The great desideratum or goal which all mankind are striving to gain is happiness. Happiness, not only here on this earth plane, but eternal happiness in the future.

To obtain this much-wished-for condition, hours, yea days, weeks, months, years, and a lifetime is spent in studying solutions of ways and means, and unnumbered schemes have been sought out and resorted to by the people, in their anxiety and ignorant and fanatical egotism, and applied in numberless ways to secure this desired result—happiness. Nor is this the case alone on the material plane, but reaches to the higher, or spiritual plane or soul aspirations.

To secure this, religions and religious theories without number have been formulated and invented, in past ages, by the people among the nations of the earth, and daily taught the ignorant masses, by the priestly class, and thousands, yea millions upon millions of money, and ages of time spent in erecting suitable places wherein to worship their various Gods, etc., etc., and all have had their full quota of believers and followers, and all alike conscientious and sanguine in their position, and tenaciously held to, as being the only route through which to secure a paid-up "Policy," and free ticket admitting them to pass through the pearly gates into the New Jerusalem above, and a reserve seat, immediately at the right hand of the "Judge" that sits on a shining throne where eternal happiness reigns supreme.

All religions, from the earliest period of time, that we have any knowledge of, down to the present day, without an exception, are based on phenomena, resulting in phenomenal belief, and subsequent faith.

What is this belief? Mostly educated idolatry. But the Christian belief is the accepting of an unseen impossibility, and holding it as a truth, without the slightest proof of the genuineness of the same. The result is testimonial belief, and held in reverence as a faith. Now, we receive all the knowledge that we gain, through the senses, the most important of which is sight and hearing. Through these we obtain positive, definite, circumstantial and testimonial knowledge.

For instance, orthodox Christians believe that a personage called Jesus Christ, who flourished in past ages, was the veritable son of a God; that he was begotten in an unnatural way, by the overshadowing of a girl by a spirit (of course it must have been the spirit of a God), and the nation of the Jews killed him (i. e., killed the one-third of God), and that by and through the efficacy and virtue of the blood shed when they crucified and killed him, they will in some mysterious way be saved from a literal burning hell, without having the least particle of evidence in proof of the same. Their theory being founded exclusively on vague testimonial knowledge. Thus a bloody phenomenal religion called Christianity.

Now a very prominent contributor, of late date, in The Progressive Thinker, in treating on the theory of Spiritualism, says that "Spiritualism is not a faith, but a knowledge;" also says, "When a thing cannot be proved, it must be stated with the greatest positiveness." Surely stating a thing, even with great positiveness, does not reduce it to an absolute fact, by no means, it still remains in a state of doubt and uncertainty.

Now, I beg leave to differ with the writer of that article, that we have a positive, unquestionable proof of the truth of Spiritualism that reduces it to an absolute knowledge. I am not denying the fact that we have circumstantial proof of the truth of Modern Spiritualism, by no means; for it is a truth practically beyond a doubt. But, let us see: The foundation of Modern Spiritualism was a noise. When first heard (by a child) it received but little attention, but by the continued repetition of the noise (or raps, as they were called) attention was enlisted. Did any one see the noise? No, only heard it. Did any one see the origin of the noise? No. But so continuous and unceasing was this noise or rapping that it attracted close investigation, which investigation resulted in the discovery that there was some intelligence connected with it.

What was this intelligence? Further investigation elicited the discovery that the noises or raps were produced by departed intelligences that once lived on this earth.

Now, says one, through these communications I positively know that Spiritualism is a fact.

How do you know it?

Why, have I not seen spirits?

No, but you may have seen spirit forms, but not the spirit.

Why, yes I have. I have been to many materializing seances, and have seen spirits of all forms, from youth to old age.

Yes, that all may be, but you never saw the substance called spirit, nor no other mortal being ever did. No eye in the physical embodiment of man or woman can discern spirit; it is of too fine a texture or material to be seen with the natural eye.

Well, then, what did I see?

You saw the material spirit body, with which the spirit, or the life center of all departed beings are clothed after they have passed from the earthly physical body to a second, or another plane of existence, and no doubt somewhat materialized that it might become visible to the mortal senses. Thus the compounding of the two substances, spirit and matter, blending into one, producing what you term a spirit, but which in reality is a natural spirit body.

Well, but I know it is a fact, because it was the spirit of my departed friend.

How do you know it was? Did you see the spirit leave the body of your friend at death?

No.

Did you see the same spirit positively identified, enshrouded within the spirit body of your friend?

No, but I know it was, for it looked just like my friend, and I believe it was.

Yes, that all may be, and it might have been truly your friend, and no doubt it was. But don't you know that spirits can prevaricate, and can assume any appearance they choose to, when presenting themselves to view, perhaps for deception. Consequently you are liable to be deceived. You did not see the spirit leave the body; you did not see the same spirit, positively identified, occupying the spirit body of your friend. You only saw the spirit body, after it had sufficiently materialized to become visible to your natural eye, and it had the appearance of your friend. Thus you are without a positive proof or knowledge of the truth of Spiritualism, only a firm belief, resulting in a faith that it is so, and all from circumstantial evidence, the phenomenon of a noise.

With equal firmness and tenacity do our Christian friends believe in the efficacy of the blood of a Christ to save from a literal burning place called by them hell, the souls of all that believe in their theory. Does that make it a positive, unmitigated fact that their theory is correct?

The Spiritualist cries out No, at once, denying the efficacy of a saving grace through an intermediate, a mediator, in any form whatever, as being an unmitigated fraud. Yet both are equally conscientious in their position, and firmly "believe" they are right, each successive generation following in the footsteps of its predecessor, without ever stopping to think, or questioning the soundness of the theories advocated by their fathers, but taking it for granted that their principles and ideas were legitimately correct, being handed down from generation to generation through ages of the past.

And thus the majority rush on and on, apparently regardless of the flight of time, and the consequences, until the book of this life, here in this sphere, with all its experiences and obligations to their fellow man is closed, and thus they pass on to higher conditions, and realms of life, into the spirit, there to meet and solve the problems of life and existence face to face, that have given them so much anxiety, and such a life-long struggle, while on the earth plane.

SPIRITUALISM.

There Is a Divine Purpose in the Movement.

Let us raise the curtain higher, which separates tangible mingling between earth-dwellers and those in realms beyond Earth, that all those who are interested may have a better chance to observe and so learn truly the causes behind the diversified manifestations. The shrewd observer can thus quickly learn to classify facts in regard to rivalry and contradictions realized in mediumistic services.

As a rule, mediums are worked upon by forces corresponding to those composing their own mental and spiritual attainments and purity of motives or otherwise.

All the forces needed for physical manifestations are drawn from extraneous sources and are graded in their degrees of refinement or crudeness. That which appertains to the philosophy and religion is from higher realms and from the Christ sphere imported. Now if many mediums are brought together, who do not yet understand these rules and principles, it would result in a perfect babble of confusion; while if understood and this gradation difference observed, it would indeed serve a grand purpose in clearing up of all strife processes from which humanity has so long suffered; and too, the grumblers could be shown that they are at fault themselves, when they do not realize what they long for, because they place themselves in the wrong attitude for its reception.

When it is once realized, as it must be, that all depends on conditions that are, in most part, created by each individual, thus shaping their own experiences, then a greater effort will be put forth to learn this occult force play and, too, man must reason from the known to the unknown and draw fit comparisons to help him gain the mastery in this conditional and force study.

Everyone knows that the condition of a musical instrument as well as the talent of the performer, decides the quality of the music; that the conditions of the soil decides the yield of the produce planted, as also the rains and sunshine which must do their parts.

In all realms, the mental, and in nature, there are contingencies playing their parts. These are rated as side issues and when not spurned promptly, become fungus growths, sapping the strength of the true product and yet being valueless for any use.

In every life, and in all life's vocations, it is a constant demonstration that all results are effects of conditions. Causes, in most part, from which conditions are woven, are of a negative, in many instances of a conglomerate nature; that is, mortals have such a variety of mixed desires, all making their shapes or partial shapes in the structure of causes in the web of conditions, and thence in physical effects as a very natural sequence.

The most woes and unpleasant experiences of mortals are the result of untruthfulness. It is seldom that mortals speak as they feel. They practice what they, in a smooth way call diplomacy. They conceal many selfish aims under this bland mask and make inroads upon the rights of others, while pretending to be in sympathy and kindly feelings. Oh, the ill conditions that are created by such false practices! And the harvest from such seeding is usually very unwelcome, but must be reaped, there is not any help for it. Now all this is taught by returning spirits and plainly proves that it is Spiritualism that teaches the true rules of life and conduct, and that it is in this sense the true religion which in time will become the religion universal.

The objection to some parts of Spiritualism will disappear when mortals learn to classify it properly. It all works correspondingly. If there are impure mortals, they attract crude, unprogressed spirits. These also find like-minded mediums and must be judged by their works and classed where they belong. This alone, will insure harmony, and purposed results will never fail when these rules are enforced and maintained. Then there could be no clashing of forces between these classes, nor tangling of conditions from which come all ill and grievous realizations.

There is a divine purpose in this movement called Spiritualism.

Opposition and diversities need to be duly learned and assigned.

The eternal fitness of things must become a well-known fact of constant and general application, then harmony and happiness will become universal.

THE HIGHEST BIDDER.

[A pew at St. John's, the fashionable church at Washington, was recently put up at auction and sold for $2,700.]

Hark to the voice of the auctioneer.
Who bid? We sell salvation here;
There's a musty tale 'twas offered free
In far-off ancient Galilee,
But times have changed and you must pay
If you'd be saved in a high-toned way.
Who bid? How much for cushioned ease,
For rustle of silks with bending knees?
For well-groomed priests, and surpliced choir,
With voices the sweetest that money can hire.
For peace that only the pious know
Who worship the Lord, and comme il faut!
If you're a struggler, and long and fret
For an open door to the smartest set,
You should own a pew where they weekly meet;
Where the rich unfailingly find a seat.
A thousand? That will never do;
An aristocratic St. John pew,
With a ticket to heaven and a Fashion's smile,
Is worth a very much larger pile.
Two thousand—and one—two—three—four—five;
Ah, now you begin to look alive;
Two thousand and six, two thousand seven,
That really sounds a little like heaven;
Two seven—and—gone; you've won the goal;
Henceforth you're smart, and have saved your soul. —Life.

Living, Ringing Facts.

Before men go into pulpits, on the streets and public highways to condemn dancing they should see that they have not committed greater sins than this. There are those who think this social pastime, one recognized the world over by high and low as proper, a great sin, yet who do not hesitate to malign and traduce an innocent young lady, solely because she went to a dance, yet who is pure and free from evil acts or thoughts as the angels in heaven. If a man or woman believes dancing, novel reading, card playing and other pastimes are wrong, we shall not fall out with them for saying so; but to be consistent they should first see that they are not guilty of yet greater sins, among which none, in our opinion is more detestable than by word or insinuation endeavoring to ruin the character and tear down the social standing of a respectable young lady, and deprive her of an honest and reputable means of earning a living. In all ages, ancient and modern, by all nations, Jew and Gentile, dancing has been recognized as a social pastime for old and young. If it is to be condemned because evil has come from it in isolated cases, so should the church social, where the most debased libertine is often entertained by the mothers of the church for the 10 cents that it brings to the church treasury and fond mammas see their daughters seated at the table on social equality with men whose presence would not be tolerated for a moment at a select dance. Let us be consistent.—Medford (Okla.) Patriot.

THE HIGHEST MARK.

Shall we laugh when the world is weary
And smile when the flowers die?
Shall we feast when the world is hungry
And sing when the dead pass by?
Shall we dance in the halls of pleasure
While the hovels reek with sin?
Shall we fill no greater measure
For the peace we hope to win?

Shall we cling to the joy of living,
While want with mute appeal,
Unaided by our giving
To the tempter's hand must yield?
Shall we seek no deeper meaning
Of this great life's ebb and flow;
Than the froth and foam, and the seeming
That hide the depths below?

Shall we sleep while the world is waking?
Shall we dream while the battles rage,
In the struggle that truth is making
For a place on eternity's page?
Shall we gaze at the earth with longing,
While worlds unnumbered roll
Away in eternity's morning
That beckons the trembling soul?

Let us gather our dewy roses,
Let us take the thorns as well;
And listen if aught discloses
The story that these might tell.
Let us look to the stars above us,
That shine when the world is dark;
And learn that the depths but prove us,
And give us our highest mark.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

The Clinton Age says: "Much of the success of the camp is due to the labors of the president, W. F. Peck, of St. Louis. He has been identified with Mt. Pleasant park since the second year of its foundation and it is needless to say has done much to advance the interests of the Spiritualists. Mr. Peck has by urgent request consented to deliver a series of lectures upon the scientific and moral aspects of Spiritualism. These lectures are highly interesting and will be one of the most attractive features of the meeting."

The Chicago American has the following from Connellsville, Pa.: "Mud Island, on the Connellsville side of the Youghiogheny River, is forever deserted as a tramps' resort. For many years it has been known as a popular stopping place for them. A month ago Nathan Shaw, an army veteran, committed suicide among the green bushes of the island by shooting himself through the temple. Shaw was well known to the tramps, who now say that he visits them from the spirit world. Wild cries have been heard on the island at night; pale, weird lights flit silently through the bushes and the whole place has an uncanny atmosphere."

W. H. Brown writes from Chattanooga, Tenn.: "I hope to get a few subscribers for your most valuable paper. Long may it live, as I think it is doing a noble work all over the United States. I find more satisfaction in reading The Progressive Thinker than I do in reading all the other papers. It has more forcible, strong-minded men and women contributing for its columns than any other paper that reaches us in the Southland. My best wishes go out for its prosperity. May every family in the South take a copy."

The Spiritualist camp at Chesterfield, Ind., has stepped to the front as the leading camp in the United States. The attendance often reaches 5,000. Some of the other camps are yearly diminishing in attendance.

Harry J. Moore's address, after the 22d of this month will be Marshalltown, Iowa. Through September, Columbus, Ohio, and he will serve the Englewood Union in October. His present address is 773 West Sixty-third Place, Chicago.

Mrs. L. A. Coolidge writes: "I received a copy of The Progressive Thinker about one month ago, for which please accept my heartfelt thanks. It was to me like meeting a dear old friend. I sat me down at once to peruse its pages so full of inspiration and life-giving power. I really had a spiritual feast such as I had not had for many a day. I felt like a new being, as if I had been 'born again,' as they used to say in olden times. I send a postal order for $1.25 for The Progressive Thinker for one year and Hudson Tuttle's book entitled 'The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science.'"

Peter Anderson, of Tacoma, Wash., has our thanks for a large club of subscribers.

Lightning struck the house of John Hudock, a Russian, at Wilkesbarre, Pa. It passed down the chimney and struck a child in a cradle. When the parents rushed to the cradle the child showed no signs of life. Neighbors flocked in and, as soon as it could be done, a grave two feet deep was made. The child, stripped of all clothing, was covered with earth, its head being left free. The rain poured down, but a crowd stood about the grave, praying. Half an hour later Dr. E. M. Davis reached the place and found the child conscious and suffering very little. It was taken to the hospital and is likely to recover.

John Haddock writes: "Herewith please find $1 for continuation of The Progressive Thinker. Am not a Spiritualist, cannot be one, but I think you should be encouraged in your work against ecclesiasticism—the greatest delusion extant."

Geo. P. Colby has been lecturing at Spokane, Wash. He goes from there to Butte, and then to Billings, Mont.

The Clinton Iowa Spiritualist camp endorses organized labor as follows: "Resolved, by the board of trustees of the M. V. S. A. that we endorse most heartily every legitimate effort on the part of the producing classes to secure to themselves a just return for their labor and in view of the mighty combinations of capital in the exploitation of the various districts that such organization of labor is not only commendable but absolutely essential to secure an equitable recompense to the producer and we as an association desire to encourage in every way such organization."

Olive Whitney writes from Piedmont, Cal.: "The premium book arrived in due season. I am much pleased with it. I now have all the nine books and they are a constant source of pleasure and instruction to me." Everyone should have these nine premium books. There is no other place in this country or Europe where they can be furnished at the price—$2.75. Nor can you find in the libraries of the world nine more valuable books on Spiritualistic or occult subjects.

A man representing himself to be James Clyde Wallace is holding forth at Spokane, Wash. He claims to have been Secretary of the N. S. A. for two years—utterly false. Of course those who take no Spiritualist paper will be misled by him. He claims to be well known in this country and Europe—which is false also. He is probably the notorious Jules Wallace.

At the Clinton Camp, Iowa, the famous Zumbach quartette, in charge of Prof. Paul Zumbach, of St. Paul, furnish excellent music. A find band and orchestra under the leadership of Prof. Adolph Welse, of Clinton, discourses instrumental music for the dances, which will be held as heretofore, twice a week.

A subscriber writes: "With your kind indulgence I cannot refrain from praising Doctor Hewitt, through your valued paper, for the exalted, noble, inspirational lectures delivered by him at the Church of the Spirit Communion, 4308 Cottage Grove avenue. All members of other organizations which have closed for the summer should avail themselves of the opportunity of hearing our good Doctor, as this church will not close during the summer. The programme of these services are varied, with good music, recitations and tests. All are invited and will be made welcome to this spiritual feast."

A glance at the register of Clinton Camp shows that members come from points as far east as New York, and west as far as San Francisco. From the south there are always many members and the steamer Quincy brought up a party of campers from St. Louis and other river cities.

T. N. Travis writes: "The dramatic clubs at the camps or elsewhere will find some superior scenes for their stage acts, of great interest and importance, in E. V. Wilson's Truths of Spiritualism. Two of especial interest, and exciting, on page 41, 'The Gambler and the Spirits;' page 75, 'The Quincy Wonder.' Others in the same book. That library of information, The Progressive Thinker, comes to me regularly every week, and we are glad."

Garrett P. Serviss says: "Has the majesty of the people of England really shrunken because Edward was attacked with appendicitis, and is it, for that reason, less worthy to be proclaimed before the eyes of the world? We may deem the abandonment of the elaborate coronation ceremonial in itself a good thing, but to abandon it for superstitious reasons is not good. The whole incident is another practical argument for the abolition of monarchy even in its so-called constitutional forms."

Mrs. Susie Fentress writes: "I am still in love with your paper and I intend to take it as long as I can read. I would not subscribe for the paper just now, as my time has not expired, but I want a certain book entitled The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science, by Hudson Tuttle, while I can get it for nothing; I have four of the premium books and sometimes I am tempted to send for all of them. Excuse pencil; I am in my ninety-first year. I wish to add to my order 15 cents for the Spiritual Songster, by Mattie E. Hull; so I will enclose postoffice order for $1.40 for the paper one year and the book and the pamphlet. As ever, your well-wisher."

In a conversation with the Rev. D. C. Hughes, at that time pastor of the Baptist church, he related the following experience, which occurred while living in Wales, where he was born: "When I was about eight years old I was sent on an errand to a small village near my home. When I left the house the family were all in their usual good health. I had not gone more than half the distance to the village when I was suddenly overwhelmed with a feeling of intense sorrow, and burst out crying bitterly, which, in spite of all my efforts, continued uninterrupted while in the village and all the way home. My sister met me at the gate with the news that father had suddenly died during my absence at about the time I began crying. My clerical friend did not offer any explanation, only remarking that it was 'very, very strange.'"

J. A. McElroy desires engagements with societies east of Indiana, from September 15 to October 15, as a platform test medium. Address him at 1311 Second avenue, Evansville, Ind. He has certificate of ordination.

T. S. Russell writes: "We have engaged Harry J. Moore and Alice Gehring to serve our society during October, and Marian Carpenter for November. Brother and Sister Kates held two services for us, and their work is effective and elevating."

T. R. McAnally writes from Lawrenceburg, Tenn.: "I am an extensive reader, and your paper is the most welcome visitor I have. It is always full of good things. I am a Yale man, a teacher, and I want to locate in New Mexico or Arizona for my health. Will some one from either of these territories who may see this, write to me?"

C. H. Murray writes from Elkhart, Ind.: "The short but decisively effective criticism of the Hudson fiction, recently made in the Progressive Thinker, No. 661, by Florence Huntley, reminds me strongly of a story I once heard: Two snakes happened to meet in the forest. Snake number one seized the tail of snake number two, and began to swallow it. Likewise did snake number two with snake number one, and each of them persisted until they both entirely disappeared. Now read Miss Huntley's review and note how ably she shows how Hudson's subjective mind and his objective mind swallow each other until there is nothing left in sight. It is most amusing and leaves the logic of this astute speculator dangling in space."

W. E. T. writes: "When we look around us and see the beautiful things of this earth, and their beautiful construction, the proof of a supreme power is unquestionable, and this power (God) has formed all things so beautifully and so suited to our needs that it would be impossible to make any improvement upon the same. Would it have been possible for man to have been created, and to have been so wondrously formed without some supreme intelligence? What can we say regarding the animal kingdom? Would the horse, cow and ox have grown to be the size they are now, or would they have grown to be as large as houses? Take the chickens and birds, they, too, might have grown out of all proportion had there not been some wise creator. What can we say of the sea shells; they are as brittle and hard as glass, yet they grow and become larger and beautifully colored. These rules apply to all of the animals. With these things constantly confronting us, well may we say with the Psalmist, 'The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork.'"

The Journal of Lafayette, Ind., says: "To die is not unnatural, to live is not out of the ordinary, but to hover between these two barriers is most extraordinary. That is what Mrs. Emma Webster, one of the members of the Pentecost bands, did for twelve hours yesterday. Her attack was a spiritual one. She attended the 'holiness' meeting at 6 o'clock yesterday morning and became so enthused with a religious fervor that she went into a state of mental quietude and remained in her comatose condition until 6 o'clock last evening, during which time she spoke not a word nor moved a muscle. The members of the Pentecost band, who were holding the meeting, attributed the peculiar conditions of the woman to the 'power of the Lord.' Mrs. Webster said that by reason of her trance she was better able to grasp great religious truths that before had been to her unfathomable. She said she had seen heaven and many of the people therein and that during her twelve-hours trance she was able to see and think, but could not speak. In fact she said she saw many strange things and talked incessantly when she awoke. She seemed very glad to get back to the United States again."

Spiritual Mission Chapel. Services Sunday evening at 8 o'clock. Lecture, tests and messages. All invited.

C. H. Toler writes from Marietta, O., in reference to the exposure of a trumpet medium: "Undoubtedly the tricksters have been here, as the clippings I send will reveal, but part of the story is much exaggerated. A. W. Kaiser is the way he writes his name, not Kiser. No Spiritualist of much knowledge or experience attended any of his seances. Not more than a dozen who really believe in spirit communication had sittings with the trickster, and they never investigated much. All the rest were non-Spiritualists. Probably not over 30 or possibly 40 people all told attended his seances, instead of over 200 as one paper states. Kaiser is a small man with blue eyes, fair complexion and light hair. His girlish-looking wife can be easily identified by the rapid motion of her mouth as she incessantly munches a large quid of chewing gum. They called on me, stating they were from Columbus, O., saying The Progressive Thinker had frequently mentioned him favorably as a trumpet, clairvoyant and clairaudient medium. I told them I was a friend to all honest mediums, but hard down on frauds and fakes. They left a moment later. I did not attend any of their seances as I can't see in the dark, and must have evidence of honesty before I venture. If all Spiritualists or others interested in Spiritualism would take and read some good paper on the subject, like The Progressive Thinker, they would learn how to investigate and keep clear of frauds." Mr. Kaiser's methods were exposed, the sudden turning on of the light, revealing him with a trumpet in his hands, making the manifestations. Henceforth Mr. Kaiser's name will be omitted from the pages of The Progressive Thinker.

Rosa Balch writes from Binghamton, N. Y.: "I wish to thank Mrs. Clara Watson and Mrs. M. T. Longley for giving to the world their experiences. It will help others to see much that is needed to-day. If some of the mediums who are beginners could only be brought to a point of reasoning, I think there would not be as many claiming noted ones as their guides. There are many Spiritualists in this city, but we have no public meetings."

The Detroit Journal, (Mich.) says: "The obsequies of the late Stephen B. McCracken were held this afternoon, and were as nearly as could be, in accordance with Mr. McCracken's request. In memoranda sent to Detroit Lodge of Masons which conducted the funeral, a wish was expressed that the arrangements be on the lines of economy—that there be no plumed hearse, array of carriages, band or paid choir. Mr. McCracken wished a journalistic funeral. James E. Scripps should read an essay and George P. Goodale recite Arnold's 'After Death in Arabia.' Unfortunately neither of these gentlemen could take part in the program. The hymn 'There Is Rest for the Weary,' was sung as Mr. McCracken had requested, by Fred Warrington, and H. P. C. Stewart presided at the organ. Mr. McCracken's concluding hope was that no tears should be shed over his remains, and that 'people should come and go with the same buoyant steps and cheerful countenances as at a reception.' The remains were taken direct from the undertaking rooms of Handy & Bird to the crematory, where the lodge met them." Mr. McCracken was a prominent Spiritualist.

Jacob Hey writes: "The management of the Ottawa Spiritualist Camp-meeting, Kansas, have received reduced railroad rates on the certificate plan, of one and one-third fare to the camp. Parties going must call for certificate, and present the same to the secretary of the camp-meeting for signature."

Mrs. L. M. B. writes: "I send you $1.25 for The Progressive Thinker another year and the premium book, Religion of Man and Ethics of Science. It would be as impossible to get along without that paper as it would be to do without eating. One feeds the mind, the other the body."

Mrs. Laura B. Payne writes from Dallas, Texas: "I am engaged for a month to serve the societies of Dallas and Ft. Worth. I speak at this place at 3 o'clock p. m., in Woodmen Hall, and at 8:15 p. m. in the Temple at Fort Worth. My address will be 107 Swiss avenue, Dallas, Texas, until the 20th of August. At that time I shall start south, making various points en route to Galveston. The Texas State National Association of Spiritualists holds its annual convention at Galveston, the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th of September. A large attendance and a profitable and enjoyable meeting is expected. May the Spiritualists of Texas rally to their cause on this occasion."

A. M. Bowden writes: "The Progressive Thinker received this morning, for which accept my thanks. If you remember, I have been a subscriber for years, but lately thought I could get along without it, but am convinced I may as well try to live without my head, as to try to get along without it."

Mrs. S. A. Walters writes from 2119 California street, Denver, Colo.: "I desire to communicate with parties in the state or near-by points who are Spiritualists, investigators, or liberal-minded people. I am an inspirational and trance speaker, public and private test medium. I officiate at weddings or funerals. Terms reasonable."

"Human Culture and Cure. Part First. The Philosophy of Cure. (Including Methods and Instruments." By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL. D. A very instructive and valuable work. It should have a wide circulation, as it well fulfills the promise of its title. For sale at this office. Price 75 cents.

Lily Dale Camp Notes.

Mrs. Clara Watson, J. Clegg Wright, Lyman C. Howe, Mrs. Richmond and Prof. Lockwood were the leading lights illuminating the mental horizon of the camp last week.

Hon. John J. Lentz, of Columbus, Ohio, was the speaker Sunday afternoon, August 3. The largest audience of the season, so far, gathered to hear this celebrated orator as he fearlessly and eloquently proceeded to unmask the "Christian Liars" of the past and present. Judging by the storms of applause which continually greeted him, this he did to the entire satisfaction of the hundreds who listened. Mr. Lentz is a straightforward man, and holds nothing back in his fearless advocacy of right and justice.

The weather god seems to have relented and finally condescends to smile. Sunday was fair and every train was loaded with passengers for Lily Dale.

The untiring efforts of President Gaston and his assistants to make this summer's camp a success is everywhere in evidence. In spite of the untoward conditions of the weather during the past weeks, Lily Dale maintains its record of being the banner camp in every particular. Good management brings good results.

The band of Willing Workers, auxiliary, are lending a helping hand, and the auditorium, another year, will show their co-operation with the association in many ways.

Monday afternoon, Mrs. Loe Prior gave her first lecture which she supplemented with tests. This is Mrs. Prior's introduction to a Lily Dale audience, though well known elsewhere as a speaker and medium.

Tuesday, J. Clegg Wright in the afternoon, took for his subject "Spiritualism Since the Days of Shakspeare." Submitting to the "Ghost Man," Mr. Wright gave one of his always deeply interesting lectures. In the evening Mrs. Sherman presented the play, "Above the Clouds," to a full house.

Wednesday, Mrs. Prior was the speaker of the morning. Hon John J. Lentz in the afternoon. The tremendous applause during his talk, and at the close of his address, was only deserved testimony to the masterly effort he placed before the people. Wednesday evening's dance closed the exercises of Labor Day.

The usual interest is manifest in the phenomena, and our mediums are kept busy; Mrs. Wilcox and Winans and Norman being the materializing for full form; Mrs. Wreidt, Mrs. Bartholomew, and one or two others, trumpet mediums, and F. Corden White and the Keelers, slate-writing.

There are many other good mediums doing good work.

The library is well patronized and contains much good reading. Contributions to the library in money or books, gratefully received. Address Marion Skidmore Library, Lily Dale, N. Y.

The entertainments under the management of Mrs. Sherman have drawn good houses. Mrs. Parkus, soloist, and Mrs. Connor, pianist, have given some beautiful selections of music. Mrs. Parkus has a wonderfully clear voice, of depth and sweetness, and she has been quite an acquisition to the musical program.

The Parker-Bowens are soon to be here, when another rich treat will be given in the musical line. After them, Mrs. Ely, and so the times moves on, each week bringing some rare offerings to the shrine of spiritual advancement at Lily Dale.

MARY WEBB-BAKER.

Grand Ledge, Camp, Mich.

Mr. and Mrs. Kates of Philadelphia, will arrive here August 8, to fill their week's engagement at our camp, and will receive a warm welcome from their many friends at Grand Ledge. Mr. Kates is a logical and philosophical speaker, and Mrs. Kates ranks high in her work as a test medium.

Tuesday evening, Mr. Geo. H. Brooks (who is our present speaker) held an old-fashioned "spellin skool" in hotel parlors, which afforded much amusement for all those present.

Wednesday afternoon, a tea party was held in the auditorium, and all who were fortunate enough to attend, had their cups read by "imported seers."

The Wednesday evening dancing parties are becoming a marked and very enjoyable feature of the camps.

Prof. W. T. Harris, of Grand Rapids, a member of the Schubert Club, and tenor singer of the People's church, favored the camp with a visit a few days this week.

The camp association feels that it is blessed in having among the campers, the sweet singers, Mr. and Mrs. Clyde Goodrich, of Marcellus, who have added so much to the services by their solos and duets.

Friday morning, Mr. Brooks, assisted by the campers, gave an "Old Folks Concert" in the auditorium. Many specialties were given, and all who participated displayed much ability in their especial line.

We have several good mediums with us at present and Farmer Riley is expected the last week of camp.

LAURA MATLOCK, Sec'y.

Lake Brady Camp, O.

On Sunday, August 3, Mr. F. D. Donakin, of Cecil, Ohio, lectured for the Lake Brady association. He opened the meeting by reading a selection from Hudson Tuttle's writings, "What Is Spiritualism?" "General Law" was the subject for the morning's discourse, and in the afternoon the topic taken was "Modern Spiritualism, and What It Has Done." Mr. Donakin is a fluent speaker and handles his subject in a manner to convince his hearers that he is an earnest and truthful worker in the cause.

C. H. Figuers, of Cleveland, gave the messages after the lecture in the afternoon, all of which were fully recognized.

On Tuesday morning a conference was held. In the evening Mr. Figuers gave a test seance for the benefit of the camp.

On Wednesday evening the ladies held their annual fair, which, owing to the rain of the afternoon, was not as well attended as hoped for.

The camp is doing as well as can be expected after the many drawbacks it has had.

Vicksburg Camp, Mich.

Never was a brighter or happier opening than at this 19th annual camp.

The weather being fair, there were many new arrivals, and our genial man of all work was kept busy putting up tents all day Saturday.

Among the late arrivals are Mr. and Mrs. Sprague, of Jamestown, N. Y., and daughter, Mrs. Marie Holden, of Grand Rapids; Mrs. Russell, Alliance Ohio; Mr. and Mrs. L. S. Burdick, Texas; Mrs. Nelson, Bellevue; Mrs. Estelle, Battle Creek.

Sunday morning trains brought many seekers after spiritual truths from both Battle Creek and Kalamazoo and our hustling gate-keeper, Allen Ryan, was kept busy till late in the afternoon.

An unusually large audience for first Sunday greeted Mr. Sprague at both morning and afternoon sessions and all were highly entertained by his whole-souled manner and forcible eloquence.

The tender pathos of Mrs. Russell's songs touches a sympathetic chord in the hearts of the listeners and brought back memories and scenes of other days. Miss Amy Pellett, as accompanist, will assist at each Sunday session.

Monday is always a quiet day in camp, after the Sunday crowd, from both in and out of town, has taken its departure.

The class in physical culture was well attended, and great interest manifested. The main feature of the lesson was the breathing exercise and what may be accomplished by proper respiration.

The conference of Monday afternoon was a very interesting feature of the day's program, the subject for discussion being "The Possibilities of the Spirit While Yet in the Physical Body; and What May Be Accomplished by Telepathy." Abram Powers led in the discussion and presented many interesting ideas.

The lyceum Tuesday morning was not so well attended as we had hoped it might be. There are as yet few children in camp.

The lecture in the afternoon by Mr. Sprague, was a fine specimen of oratory. His subject was "Everything in the Universe Is Seeking Light." He said in part: "We place the tiny seed in the ground and it seeks the light. We can no more find life in the seed than we can find the soul in man, but placed in proper conditions it will expand and grow, and if we had ears fine enough, we could hear that little life groaning, struggling, cracking its shell, and pushing its way through dark earth till kissed by the magnetic rays of noonday sun."

There were many visitors from town in attendance at the Wednesday afternoon meeting.

A very able discourse was presented by Mr. Sprague, subject, "Birth and Death, the Mysteries of Life."

J. R. Klauser and wife, mediums, palmists and astrologers, of Indianapolis, Ind., occupy the Northside Cottage.

Mr. Charles Barnes, of Marion, Ind., is shaking hands with old friends after a nabsence of several years.

Dr. Rosa Conger, of Chicago, gave her friends a pleasant surprise by coming unannounced, Tuesday afternoon. She will occupy Mrs. Jennie Semon's cottage.

Miss Delpha Hughes, editor of the children's department of Light of Truth, is visiting camp this week.

The annual meeting of the Jeannette Fraser Camp Society was held at the auditorium, Thursday, August 7, and the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Jeannette Fraser; vice-president, D. F. Smith; secretary, Cora Fuller; treasurer, Jennie Smalley; trustees, Robert Baker; Thomas Nesbitt, James Stratten.

CORA FULLER, Sec'y.

Lake Brady Camp.

One-half of the camp season here has expired, yet the attendance is large, lacking only the nightly seance that has made Lake Brady popular. The mediums located here are Mrs. Ebertshauser, Mrs. Murray, D. A. Herrick, Mrs. Porter, Mrs. McFarland.

Mr. P. Wernum, of Toledo, spoke at the auditorium Wednesday afternoon. He was requested to give his "conversion" to Spiritualism. Mr. Wernum is eighty-five years of age. He recalled past events as well as a man of fifty would, and gave a clear idea of how spirit impressed him to make inventions. He saw the picture, and from it he saw how to convert it into a useful article.

On Sunday, August 3, F. D. Donakin opened the fourth lecture course of the season. His subject was General Law as applied to mediation between the spheres of life. He ended the discourse by repeating an inspirational poem. The poem was well rendered.

In the afternoon Mr. Donakin again addressed a large assembly on the subject of Modern Spiritualism. He presented facts hithertofore unknown to this side of life. One was, there had been no marked inventions until the advent of Modern Spiritualism, for with it came the inventions through electricity. The same power that inspired Spiritualism inspired these inventions. Another idea given was, the power of the second sphere evolved the life to this the first sphere.

At the close of the lecture Mrs. Heaton prepared the way for the spirit to come and give messages through the brain of C. H. Figures, by singing the old song, "A Thin Veil Between Us," in soft low tones that is music to both spheres. Mr. Figures gave many messages from the spirits to their friends.

The camp is making active preparations to buy a Home at Lake Brady.

MRS. LYDIE L. CURTIS.

Chesterfield Camp, Ind.

Never have the grounds at Chesterfield been more beautiful than the present season. The copious rainfall has left everything sweet and clean. The fine new auditorium, which with the other new improvements is said to have cost over $4,000, is well furnished and most attractive. The speakers are provided with most comfortable quarters at the pretty Westerfield Cottage. The dining-room is well kept and meals well served.

Mr. Lyman C. Howe, Mr. Barrett, Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown and Mrs. Marian Carpenter have all been here this season, and for each one only praise is heard for their splendid work.

My own engagement is a most pleasant one. I will return to 4312 Greenwood avenue, Chicago, about the 9th inst., and about September 1 will start for my home in San Francisco.

I find our truth is surely spreading, and can certainly see that the outlook for the cause is good.

THE Kola Plant CURES HAY FEVER AND ASTHMA.

FREE. The African Kola Plant is Nature's Positive Cure for Hay-fever and Asthma. In the short time since its discovery this remarkable botanical product has come into general use in the hospitals of Europe and America as an unfailing specific cure for Hay-fever and Asthma in every form. Its cures are really marvelous. Dr. W. H. Vall, a prominent physician of St. Louis, Mo., writes March 8th, 1902, that he used Himalya on six different Hay-fever patients last fall with satisfactory results in each case. Mrs. M. A. Scott, Crosby, Mich., writes March 6th, 1902, that Himalya completely cured her after fifteen years persistent suffering of Hay-fever and Asthma. Rev. J. L. Combs of Martinsburg, W. Va., wrote to the New York World, July 23rd, that Himalya cured him of Asthma of thirty years' standing. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, editor of the Farmer's Magazine, Washington D.C. was also cured, although he could not lie down for fear of choking, being always worse in Hay-fever season. Hundreds of others send similar testimony proving Himalya truly a wonderful remedy. As the Kola Plant is a specific constitutional cure for the disease, Hay-fever sufferers should use it before the season of the attacks when practical, so as to give it time to act on the system. If you suffer from Hay-fever or Asthma, in order to prove the power of this new botanical discovery, we will send you one trial case by mail entirely free. It costs you absolutely nothing. Write to-day to The Kola Importing Co., No. 1162 Broadway, New York.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

J. E. Phillips: Q. What became of the souls of all between the fall of man and the crucifixion of Christ? Did the death of Christ have a retroactive effect, or are their souls in hell?

A. This correspondent is a wanderer out of the fog-land of theology, and would have the old and the new reconciled. There are two ways of answering these questions: First, the theological, and learned divines have wrangled, and armies have fought over its solution. Plainly if Christ came to save the world and belief on him is essential, all those who lived before his advent cannot be saved. His death cannot have a reactionary effect. All the swarming peoples of antiquity went over the abyss of death into hell.

The second answer is the negation of all this net-work of myths. It is based on the knowledge of man and the world. Man is a creature of evolution; has continually advanced and has never fallen: Hence has no use for a savior. Christ had no power to save souls except as his ability to instruct and lead to a better and higher life surpassed others.

Oh, if all this superstition, the accumulation of many thousand years' heredity, could be effaced! Now the new seed is choked with the weeds of error, which appear impossible to eradicate. What an easy task to learn if the old had not to be unlearned! If the angel of Forgetfulness could wave his wand and blot from the minds of men all beliefs, ideas and thoughts and mental inheritance previous to twenty-five years ago, how readily would the new be accepted. As it is, every foot of advance is a battle-field, and the way has to be cleared of dense masses and undergrowth, and the bushwhackers dislodged from each successive vantage point.

G. P. Bickwell: Q. Is there any publication for sale containing an account of the Koons' Spirit Room? If not, will you enlighten us?

A. Emma Hardinge Britten in her book on "American Spiritualism," gives an extended account of this famous room and the manifestations which occurred there. This work, published in 1870, is out of print and difficult to obtain. The plain facts may be briefly stated. Mr. Koons lived in Millfield, Athens county, O., one of the most broken regions in that state. At the time, 1852, it was reached only by stage over the roughest roads, from Columbus 72 miles distant. Koons was endeavoring to support a large family by farming the not over-generous land. He was, as all who knew him admitted, an earnest, upright and honest man. He became interested in the Rochester rappings, and soon after found that his son, Nahum, was a medium. Through communications from spirits he was directed to build a "spirit room," dedicated to the purpose. He followed instructions and built a house of logs in primitive style, as nearly all the country houses were then built. When finished he laid paper on the table he had made, and locked the door. He knew no human being could enter, yet when he unlocked the door the next day, he found the paper covered by a lengthy communication. The spirits ordered musical instruments, and then the manifestations became wonderful.

The report of a delegation from Cleveland may be taken as representative of the many others. It was published in Spiritual Universe, then issued in that city. The delegates were well known citizens of unimpeachable veracity. They stayed two days and nights, and by careful examination were convinced that there was no deception. The house was of logs, locked at the corners, twelve by fifteen feet in size. It was situated on open ground some distance from any other building, allowing of no concealment, had it been desired. It was furnished with a long table on which was placed a strangely devised machine of copper and zinc, for concentrating the force, and by it were a harp, guitar, violin, accordion, tambourine, triangle, bells, and tin trumpet. Two drums were hung on a high frame, and a small round table placed near the large one.

The full circle consisted of Mr. Koons, his wife and eight children. They sat in a semi-circle around the table, and the visitors on benches immediately back of them. The visitors were allowed to move and place the furniture as they pleased, and had every opportunity for examination. The manifestations consisted of playing of the instruments in concert, rappings, voice speaking through the trumpet. The most marvelous was the appearance of a luminous hand, which floated in the air, and wrote lengthy messages with incredible rapidity. Visitors came by the score from all parts of the country. There was no place for them to stay, and Mr. Koons entertained them. A score or more was not an unusual number of these strangers with whom he shared his narrow house, and the wife provided meals. For this, and attendance at the circle not a farthing was demanded or received. He was reduced to narrow circumstances by this drain on his resources.

A neighboring farmer, John Tipple, built a room and furnished it exactly like that of Mr. Koons, and with his wife and family of ten children held circles, receiving identically the same phases of manifestations. The fate of these wonderful pioneers is sad to contemplate. Both were brought to financial ruin by the horde of visitors. When their means were exhausted, they saw that there must be a change, and they joined forces to give a traveling exhibition, but they missed the home surroundings, and could not get the astonishing phenomena.

Mr. Tipple removed to Kansas, and Mr. Koons to Illinois, where he struggled on to maintain himself. His family had grown to maturity and gone to homes of their own, and hence the circle could not be held. He died some years ago, firm in the belief which had for nearly fifty years been his staff of support. And thus was closed one of the most marvelous episodes of the early years of the great movement. The manifestations were incomparable with those at Hydesville. The communications spoken through the trumpet, or written by the detached hand, were entirely beyond, in thought and expression the intelligence and culture of these humble people. No disclosures were ever made reflecting on their honesty. There is at present nothing comparable. The great wave of spirit power which came at that time has receded.

Parental and Spirit Birth in Parallelism.

In the grand economy of nature we have others of various grades as forms of matter, then an intermediate of life energy, and thirdly spirit, the last and highest energy. Man, as an expression of these in nature, has two births, which hold consecutive relations as factors of conditions. Prenatal conditions, in the order of parental inheritance, form, and in a great measure, determine organic conditions of individuality. The character of parental forces transmitted unconsciously shapes our organic development, and wield an irresistible influence as formative factors. Each entity can be but the compound of the forces transmitted. Genius and honor find their origin in ancestral cause. Each organic entity can only unfold what is germinally incorporated, and brings into activity and use parental forces and proclivities in consecutive development. Thus our organic life is polarized by prenatal conditions before we reach the independence of individuality. Fetal and organic life are inseparably related as cause and effect. In the same manner is our organic and spirit life related, for the organic life forms conditions for the spirit life, as the foetal does for the organic. The foetal life prepares and lays the foundation for the organic life in the relative proportion and strength of the faculties, and mold of structure. It maps the path of volition and action in predisposed tendencies. The parental legacy is predominantly the seal of our earthy destiny, and colors our sky with sombre or bright hues, places in hand the pen of thought, and tool of the artificer, gives expression to the tongue of the orator, and deceit of the libertine. As germs of disease are transmitted organically, so a murderous thought impressed on the foetus is often executed in adult life. And on the contrary great benevolence finds its execution in the leader of a nation.

If prenatal conditions wield an overpowering influence in organic life, so does organic conditions exercise a like influence on spirit life. As we approach adult development we modify, to some extent, prenatal conditions, and in spirit life we progress beyond the influence of the earthly organic. From the cradle to the grave, prenatal influences are a beacon light or a storm-cloud to earth life, and from sphere to sphere in spirit life the survival of organic conditions give color and form to spirit scenery—for we meet the effects of earthly conditions in spirit life which shape the direction of development, as the idiosyncrasy of selfhood is based on prenatal causes. There is no point on the line of progression where one or the other is totally neutral. Let the laws of each be understood and observed, to improve man organically and spiritually. Man, once organized, never returns through the path of reincarnation, but like the solar system in its circuit through space, makes the eternal circuit of the spheres in spirit life. W. A. JONES.

"Destiny."

"Destiny" is the title of a pamphlet by Hon. Andrew Stevenson, of Mansfield, Ohio. It certainly contains some excellent thoughts on this subject. The author says:

"Now, by the term 'evolution' we mean 'continuous, progressive change, according to certain laws and by means of resident forces.' The greatest, in fact the type of evolution is the embryonic development, as it is also the most easily understood. Man, as an instance, has become what he is by a gradual process beginning as a microscopic spherule of living but apparently unorganized protoplasm, it gradually added cell to cell, tissue to tissue, organ to organ, and function to function, thus becoming more and more complex in the gradual action of its correlated parts, as it passed successively through the stages of germ, egg, embryo and infant to maturity. You and I have watched even without the aid of instruments a deposit of spawn in some out of the way pond of water until the development of the tadpole, as the people call it, and afterward its development as a frog. A rain barrel in the summer time develops animalculae large enough to be seen by the naked eye, then on up to the surface take wings and fly away. The silk worm weaving himself a tomb, and afterward the cocoon bursting its cerements, so that the butterfly might take its place in nature. Thus, while as in the egg the process may be hidden from our view, when the shell is burst open there is forced on us the potential fact, the protoplasm has germinated, the various functions of life assume their places, and the bird assuming a new mode of life, takes its place in the order of nature.

"This the student of biology calls evolution taught by the embryo. But there must be antecedent life. I have taken pains to examine many of the authors upon this point, including Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Spencer, Leconte and Draper, and I find no dissenting voice on this point; life can only come from life. So that with me it is sometimes a question whether there is such a thing as death, or only a transition of form. But I cannot stop upon that point now. We are upon the subject of evolution and development of organized life as taught by the science of biology."

A copy of this pamphlet can be obtained of the author for 25 cents. Address him at Mansfield, Ohio.

THE PROPHECY OF A NOTED SEER.

Thank God, Popery Is to End Sometime.

SAINTS WORDS ON FORMER HEADS OF ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH ARE VERIFIED.

To the Editor:—Cardinal Jerome Maria Gotti, [as set forth in the Chicago Record-Herald] the new prefect of the propaganda, has been designated as the next Pope of Rome by Leo XIII. himself and by the author of the remarkable propheeies generally attributed to St. Malachy.

The story of the cardinal's career has all the elements of the romantic. He is surrounded, like Napoleon, by the mystic light of prophecy. He rose with one bound from obscurity to eminence. He is the popular hero of religious Rome. He seems to have behind him the force of unseen and mysterious power. Difficulties, apparently insurmountable, have melted away when he has come upon the scene.

Under his touch chaos has given place to order. The son of a Genoese dock laborer, there is now gathered about him a large and influential party which looks upon him as if he were already elected Pope and crowned with the triple diadem of old Rome.

PROPHECY APPLIES WELL.

But remarkable as he is in many ways the thing that distinguishes him most and sets him apart from his brother cardinals is the singular fact that he is the one member of the present college of cardinals to whom the prophecy of St. Malachy applies in full force.

According to Malachy, Jerome Maria Gotti will be the next Pope of Rome. Gotti seems to have emerged from a complex network of circumstances for the sole purpose that the prophecy should be fulfilled; for had it not been the peculiar circumstances that made Gotti a cardinal, the Malachian prediction would have failed for the first time in centuries; had it not been for Cardinal Gotti's peculiar life there would have been no cardinal to whom the prophecy would have applied.

As a man and a churchman, Cardinal Gotti has an interesting history, but the manner in which he figures in the prophecies of Malachy is perhaps the most fascinating light in which he can be regarded.

PUZZLE FOR SKEPTICS.

Few people nowadays take much stock in prophecy and many are disposed to regard with levity these predictions concerning the succession of the Popes of Rome. But he who looks into them even with the eye of the skeptic must admit that their strange fulfillment is at the very least a coincidence that is striking in high degree.

The prophecies of Malachy have been taken for what they are worth by the authorities of the church. That they have been verified in a most striking way is not denied, inasmuch as their verification is an indisputable fact. The chief point of interest about them at the present time, however, lies with the prediction concerning the successor to the reigning pontiff, and if Malachy is to be trusted now as in the past Cardinal Gotti will be the man.

The Malachian prophecies fix the papal succession with a stroke of the pen. With reference to the successor of Pope Leo the prophecy reads: "Religio depopuenta," meaning "monasticism plundered." The question is, how does this phrase apply to Cardinal Gotti?

OBSTACLES REMOVED.

When the government of Brazil was changed from the imperial to the republican form there was considerable feeling against the friars of the country, much the same as that which is now causing so much trouble in the Philippines. The monks were threatened with expulsion, and it looked for a time as if there would not be a shred of church property left after the new party in power had wreaked its will.

At this juncture Pope Leo sent Gotti to Brazil, armed with plenary power to act for the Vatican. At that time Gotti was the superior of the Barefoot Carmelites and a simple priest. He went to Brazil, administered the affairs of the friars with a rod of iron, and so tactfully handled the new government that the property of the church was saved and the most pleasant relations established with the Vatican. For this service he was made a cardinal.

PROPHECIES FULFILLED.

Some of the most striking fulfillments of the Malachian prophecies are as follows:

Of Celestine II. St. Malachy prophesied, "Ex Castro Tiberis," from the Castle on the Tiber. Celestine came from the town of Castello at the source of the Tiber. Of Lucius II. he wrote: "Inimicus Expulsus," the enemy chased. The family name of Pope Lucius was Caccianemico, which may be translated as "Chase-enemy." Of Eugene II. Malachy phophesied, "Ex Magnitudine Monte," meaning from the greatness of the mountain. This Pope came from Grammonte, or great mountain.

In a similar manner were described prophetically the Popes Pius VII., Pius IX. and Leo XIII. Of the present Pope the prophecy reads, "Lumen in Coelo," a light in the sky. Pope Leo's coat of arms is a cypress tree growing on a hillock with a fiery star shining upon it. A few more of these prophecies will serve to illustrate their character. Clement III., "De Schola Burt," he will come out of school. Clement's family name was Scalare.

Innocent III., "Comes Signatus," a signed count. This pontiff was of the family of the counts of Sequi, and Sequi is the Italian for signs.

Gregory IX., "Avis Ostiensis," the bird of Ostia. Gregory's coat of arms was an eagle, and he was bishop of Ostia.

Clement IV. was described as "Draco depressus," a crushed snake, and Clement's arms were an eagle clutching a snake.

"Frigidus Albus," a cold abbot, was the description given by Malachy of Benedict XII. This Pope was abbot of Front Froide (cold spring) in Beauvais.

BELIEVED BY CHURCH.

Although these prophecies are not supposed to be a historical document, they nevertheless have considerable significance in the minds of churchmen, and it is believed that they have had some influence on the papal elections. At all events half of Rome believes, on the strength of them, that Cardinal Gotti will be the next Pope, and Leo has frequently referred to his favorite cardinal as "my successor." It is said that his holiness has even gone out of his way to designate Cardinal Gotti in this manner, but not as if he were making a selection. He has always spoken of Gotti not as if he would like to have him as his successor, but as if it were already a perfect assurance in the Pope's mind that Gotti would inevitably succeed.

This extraordinary man was born in Genoa, March 29, 1834. His family belonged to the lowest of the social strata of Italy. The elder Gotti was a dock laborer, with little learning and no ambitions. The son, however, disclosed a phenomenal devotion to religion, and at the age of 14 he entered the Barefoot Carmelite Order, and proved so brilliant a scholar that he was soon transferred to the house of the order at Rome. Little by little he rose from one post to another, always making an advance with every new change, until he became superior of the mother house of the society and was finally chosen superior general.

While he was in this position of power the Pope sent him to Brazil, where he showed administrative ability of the highest order.

LOWLY IN SPIRIT.

Cardinal Gotti lives in a palace overlooking the forum of Trajan, but he is still the barefoot monk, at least in spirit. His sleeping apartment is furnished like that in which he slept during the years when he was an ascetic and student, and he uses no display save that which is positively imposed upon him by the rules regarding the life of a cardinal.

In his private life he is very modest. Whatever he may think of his future in connection with the papal throne he wisely refrains from all comment on the subject. He takes the most philosophical view of the case.

"To discuss the topic," he says, "would be to admit its likelihood or its desirability, and that I certainly cannot and do not wish to do."

The cardinal in stature is rather under than over the middle height, has a very kindly expression, and a face that is considered handsome, at least from the male point of view. In manner he is affability itself. People here in Washington who have had the pleasure of meeting Cardinal Gotti say that the charm of the man's personality remains in the mind for a long time like the memory of a tuneful air.

EIGHT MORE POPES.

Should the cardinal become Pope, the prophecies of Malachy will have acquired new importance. If these prophecies be supposed to be true it would mean that only eight more Popes will rule in the chair of Peter. Including the successor of Leo XIII., Malachy provides for only nine occupants of the papal throne in the future. According to Roman Catholic tradition this could mean only one thing, namely, that the coming of the successor to the papacy ninth in order from Pope Leo will usher in the millennium. Those who take a nonreligious view of the prophecy will contend, of course, that if the predictions be good the end of them will mean the vanishing of organized Christianity—or at least of the present organization of the holy Roman Church—from the earth.

END OF PAPAL REIGN.

But from whatever view these prophecies are regarded, calculations have been made as to the precise year in which the last of the predictions is to be realized. These calculations are based on the average duration of papal reigns. This average has been seven years, but up to 1900 it was six years, in which case the author of the prophecies fixes the end of the papacy in the year A. D. 1906.

The very last Pope, according to Malachy, should be characterized by the phrase "Gloria Olivae," the glory of the olive, which, in symbolic interpretation, would mean universal peace. The date and the symbolism correspond with the calculations on which some Christian interpreters of the Bible base the prediction that the sixth millennium from the creation of the world would be marked by the second advent of Christ; and this millennium would be ushered in about the year 1996.

These matters may or may not have an influence on the selection of the Pope by the college of cardinals; but whether they do or not it is not to be denied that the prophecy of Malachy throws about the great Carmelite cardinal a mystic halo which distinguishes him in a decidedly interesting way from his brothers of the sacred college.

It is indeed encouraging to know that there will come an end to the rule of Popes. The clouds of ignorance and superstition must depart sometime.

Ideal Park Camp, Pa.

To the Editor:—We desire to call attention to the spiritual camp-meetings now being held at Ideal Park under the auspices of the First Spiritual Church of Allegheny City. Ideal Park is a beautiful site overlooking the Chartiers Valley and the Ohio River, thirty minutes' ride from Pittsburg.

Our camp opened on the first Sunday in July with an attendance of from 600 to 700. The day was beautiful and the sweet songs of the birds added to the pleasure of the hour. Ideal Park has a large pavilion that will seat from 1,200 to 1,500 people, with a beautiful cherry grove and one of the finest springs in the state.

Our service was opened by a selection from the choir, "America." At 10:30 scriptural reading by the speaker of the First Spiritual Church. At 10:45, Mr. Day, the speaker in charge, advanced to the platform and took for his subject, "Creation." He spoke for about an hour with force and power upon the subject.

At the close of his lecture, Mrs. Demorest, Mrs. Cook, Mrs. Lloyd and others followed with delineations, all of which were fully recognized by the friends present.

In the afternoon Mr. Day again took the platform, speaking upon the subject, "The Voice of Reason, or the Growth of Modern Spiritualism," which brought from the audience great applause. Delineations were again taken up by the above mediums and others.

At the evening service once more the speaker of the day took the platform, taking for his subject, "Skepticism of Man."

In all, the camp-meeting was a grand success for the first day and has increased in interest each Sunday and will continue through July and August.

We are glad to say that the camp-meeting has set a great many to thinking upon the broad subject of Spiritualism, and we trust that before the close of our meetings Spiritualism shall reap a golden harvest, and many sheaves shall be gathered as the first fruits of the Spiritualist camp in Pennsylvania.

THE CORONATION.

The King and the Numerous Prophets.

The coronation of Edward VII, King of Britain, is now definitely arranged to occur on August 9, that is, of course, dependent upon the condition of the king at that time. His mind has been greatly disturbed over the astrological predictions which have been made in all quarters of the globe concerning the coronation.

It has been positively asserted by some that the proclamation concerning the coronation occurred at a time when the planets were unfavorable, and that the proclaimed coronation would never occur. Others say that Uranus is the ruling planet governing the royal family, and is arrayed against its prosperity.

These predictions have been made known to the king, and have so far disturbed the mind of his majesty that he has concluded to hasten the time for the coronation from what was anticipated, and considered to be the better time for it by his physicians. They have concluded that as their royal patient is in such a state of excitement that the prolongation of it will be more detrimental than the risk of the excitement of the coronation, and, therefore, have agreed to the time proposed by the king.

Light, our London contemporary, dated July 5, prints quite a list of these predictions of Dr. Max Muehlenbruch, on December 13, 1899.

"After the present war in Africa, England will be at peace up to 1903. Thereafter we see much upheaval and dissatisfaction all over Great Britain.

The Prince of Wales will not keep the throne, and 1905 will see him pass to the life beyond mortal sight. The throne will pass to the next in line, two of whom will hold short terms.

"The planetary conditions show us that there will be many unexpected and strange transitions for that country up to 1910, thereafter peace and tranquil conditions will reign supreme."

King Edward's reign will, no doubt, be a very short one, as may also be his successor. The power which the planets exert over persons and nations is marvelous, and we shall watch events concerning Great Britain with the utmost interest. Though we are not an enthusiast on astrology, we have witnessed some things in late years which prove beyond contradiction that there is much in it.

Several of our local mediums have received communications from the spirit world, claiming that King Edward will never be crowned at all. We have one in particular in mind, though we deem it better not to give the name at present, who claims that her spirit guides say distinctly that he will pass away before the close of the present month.

To confirm this idea, we read in the San Francisco Examiner of July 24, that experts are now reading between the lines of the bulletins issued by his physicians, and have concluded that his condition is rather alarming, even now, especially as his physicians hint that another operation may be necessary in a very short time.

The eyes of the world are, therefore, fastened upon King Edward VII at the present time, not only because of his physical condition, but because of the many prophecies and spirit messages that are recorded concerning the brevity of his reign.—The Philosophical Journal.

Summerland Beach Camp, O.

The second week of this camp began Sunday, August 3. The day was perfect, and the large commodious tent held an appreciative audience. We had with us a number of Columbus coworkers. The speakers during the morning session were Bro. H. C. Boerstler, president of the West Side Spiritual Church, Columbus, for the past two years—a thorough Spiritualist. He was at his best on Sunday, and assisted Bro. Ripley on the platform; his address was earnest and sincere. Bro. J. C. Drummond, also a co-worker from Columbus, a trance speaker and test medium, made a short address that was well received. Master Dean Throckmorton, of Chillicothe, rendered a poem, and Miss Beatrice Boerstler, the talented young daughter of President Boerstler, brought the audience down in her inimitable manner of rendering her chosen recitation, she being only seven years of age. A favorite in the church and lyceum.

Afternoon session we were very fortunate in having the talented W. V. Nicum, of Columbus, who eloquently portrayed the different religions of the world in a brief and concise manner, brought out spiritual unfoldment in them all, if properly sought for by their adherents. We were all sorry when Bro. Nicum had finished, and many were the words of admiration expressed after the services for the beautifully inspired address. Bro. Nicum was accompanied by his lovely wife and accomplished daughter and his aged father, for whom he showed the greatest reverence.

Frank T. Ripley gave spirit messages and each and all were recognized and acknowledged by both stranger and friend alike.

Mrs. Hattie Gillette Webster read one of her original poems, entitled Summerland Beach, written by her for the occasion. Prof. J. M. Schatteau, magnetic and soulitic healer, addressed the audience in an appropriate manner and explained hypnotism, of which science he is a professor and teacher.

A number of visitors from Columbus are at the camp. The host and hostess at Summerland Hotel, Mr. David Climer and his amiable wife, make it a pleasure to be their guest, and the large commodious parlor overlooking nine miles of water on Buckeye Lake, with its sailboats and skiffs and steamer, lead one's thoughts to Mother Nature, and for a little while we forget the busy scenes of city life in this most beautiful place in Ohio. Excursions go each Sunday from Columbus for fifty cents the round trip on the steam cars.

HATTIE G. WEBSTER.

Mantua Camp, O.

Many thanks for your local, and here is another. The camp is progressing finely, and fairly attended considering the press in the harvest fields and the rain. Our mediums' meeting and psychic class are well attended. Our president, Dr. King, and his faithful wife, are untiring in their work, also our much loved chairman, Brother Danforth, who is seen around at his duties and dispensing cheer and kindness.

The lyceum is well conducted, and the good food at our hotel goes a long way to make the perfect harmony.

We have a boy medium, 13 years old, who is a fine speaker under inspiration; a fine palmist, reading up to the oldest in that phase.

All are well and happy and harmonious. We feel God and the spirit world are helping us.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,

(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. R. FRANCIS,

"THE UNKNOWN"

—BY—

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. Price $2.00.

WHY BE SICK?

Dr. J. M. Peebles the Famous Physician and Scientist Has Perfected a System of Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Sufferer.

Read His Valuable Book, "A Message of Hope"—It will Explain to You this Wonderful Treatment and Tell You How You Can be Healed.

Why will you continue to suffer when there is a treatment at hand that will cure you? Dr. Peebles and his associates, all physicians of wide experience and reputation, have perfected a system of treatment that promises health and strength to all.

J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D.

Many of their cures seem almost like miracles, for hundreds of those restored had traveled far and wide, trying this doctor and that, without getting any relief and were about to give up in despair when they began the treatment of Dr. Peebles.

They are able to do such wonderful cures because they work in harmony with nature, and employ her mighty healing forces in connection with mild, scientifically prepared medicinal remedies. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the depleted system, enriches the blood, improves digestion and assimilation, gives strength and tone to weakened nerves and muscles, and permanently repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing thousands of the sick to rejoice at being healed.

Why don't you sit down, at once, and write the doctors a plain, truthful letter as to your condition as you see it? If you will do this, they will carefully examine your case and send you a full diagnosis of your condition, and tell you truthfully whether or not they can cure you. This will cost you nothing, and if they find they can cure you, they will make their charges so small that anyone can afford the treatment.

If you are sick, write them at once for their full diagnosis and professional advice which will be sent without charge, together with their wonderful book, "A Message of Hope," which will explain fully this grand system of treatment and give you information that will brighten the remainder of your life. Epilepsy Cured.

At Last a Positive and Permanent Cure for This Terrible Maladay Is Discovered.

The renowned Brain and Nerve Specialist, Dr. Charles W. Green, of Battle Creek, Mich., has at last found a positive cure for Epilepsy, or Fits.

Epilepsy has baffled the medical world since the time of Hippocrates, and not until the Eminent Specialist, Dr. Green, patiently worked out his great cure has a positive cure for Epilepsy been known. The Doctor has used it in every case of fits he has treated in the past five years, hundreds of whom had tried everything they could hear of before taking his treatment, and he has yet to find the case, not due to injury, that it will not cure.

Mrs. Lizzie Green, of Boston, says: I cannot thank you enough for my deliverance from that terrible disease, Epilepsy. I had suffered with it for thirty years and had tried everything I could hear of, but the attacks only grew harder and more frequent. I had given up all hope when one of my neighbors told me of your great cure. I should not have written this if she had not urged me, for I had been fooled so often that I had resolved to pay out no more money. God bless her for urging me for you cured me and saved me from a life worse than death." Do not experiment longer with "Free Cures" and worthless nostrums containing injurious hypnotics, etc., but write at once to Dr. Charles W. Green, 214 Monroe St., Battle Creek, Mich., for full particulars of this great and tried remedy. It will cure you and brighten the end of your life. Write at once giving full facts about your case; the doctor will tell you exactly what can be done for you. Remember the treatment is positively guaranteed.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

"NO BEGINNING."

An Excellent Work for Thinkers.

This book, "No Beginning," is by William H. Maple. The Arena says of it: "The argument is unanswerable. The book will at once appeal to the reason of every reader, and leave him more amazed than ever at the prevalence of the theory of Creation." The Two has always been a fateful number. Free Thought Ideal says: "We found it full of glittering thoughts for thinkers, and the very death warrant of Christian superstition shines upon its pages." Price 75 cents.

CALIFORNIA CAMPS.

Harmony Grove, Summerland and Sycamore Grove.

"The king is dead; long live the king!" Harmony Grove Camp, in San Diego county, Cal., with its seed sowing, and its season of social and spiritual intercourse, has closed; and right on its heels opened the Summerland Camp; and now, in the near future, looms up the "third annual camp-meeting of the Southern California Spiritualist Association," to be held at Sycamore Grove, Los Angeles, from August 17 to September 17.

All things considered, Harmony Grove camp was a success. True, the farmers were in the midst of their hay harvest, which fact prevented many from attending who would otherwise have done so; and the location being away from the thickly populated centers, there are fewer people to draw from to make up the audiences.

But the seclusion of the place makes it all the more pleasant to the world-weary heart, longing for a season of repose and close communion with nature. At Harmony Grove, under the shade of its wide spreading live-oaks, with the wild birds singing in the leafy branches, notes of quail and turtle-dove calling from the surrounding woods and hills, and occasionally the weird cry of the whip-poor-will touching with a shade of sadness the moonlight nights; with the strife and turmoil of the world shut out; one may come in close touch with the spirit of nature, and also with the spirits of nature's children, the Indian, and others, who are seeking to reach the mortal plane to help earth's weary pilgrims.

A colonnade of oaks forms an avenue leading from the only cottage on the grounds to the improvised canvas and vine-covered rostrum. The public auditorium is under the shade of the same umbrageous trees, and the restaurant—a good one, too, with an experienced restaurateur in charge—is located under the branches of a patriarch oak with a spread of about two hundred and fifty feet in circumference.

J. L. Dryden gave some fine inspirational discourses. He is growing spiritually, becoming equipped for his closing work on earth, and ripening for his home "over there."

Mr. and Mrs. Howe are a host in themselves, with their varied gifts and accomplishments, including, as they do, mediumship, speaking, singing, music and public entertainment. They are quite an acquisition to the camp.

Miss Maggie Potter evinces a steady upward growth spiritually and mediumistically.

Mrs. Horder, of San Diego, has a very promising form of public mediumship, if allowed proper conditions for unfoldment.

Mrs. Jane Mullen, of National City, is not only a dear, lovable, motherly lady, but a very efficient and all-around worker—a speaker, medium, healer, and spiritual counselor. We felt almost as though mother had gone, when she was called away near the close of the camp, to attend a very sick patient.

The originators and promoters of Harmony Grove camp deserve great credit for the work they have done and are doing. Two or three families of Spiritualists in a somewhat isolated country place, cut off from the great Spiritualistic centers, as well as from the marts of trade, it was and is an arduous undertaking, and the work and responsibility fall heavily on the willing few; but these few are doing a great work, one which will develop their own spiritual natures, sow good seed for a rich harvest, by and by, brighten their entrance to the "Land of Souls," and help to build them beautiful homes where those they have helped to bring to the truth will greet them as benefactors and evangels.

E. B. Lowman and Frank C. Foster were re-elected as president and secretary, respectively. Mrs. E. B. Lowman is almost a marvel of executive ability, and, with her combined duties of assistant manager, stewardess, doctor and nurse, she was kept very busy from several days before camp opened to several days after it closed. The writer had occasion to test her ability as doctor and nurse. A severe illness laid me low the last Saturday night of the meeting, and I was advertised to lecture on Sunday afternoon. "Dr." Lowman took me in hand, and, supplemented by a magnetic treatment from the hands of the secretary's wife, enabled me to fill my part of the Sunday's program.

I did not attend, and have not heard from the Summerland Camp, and so am not able to make any report of it.

The "directory" of the camp to be held at Sycamore Grove is at hand, and if we may judge by the class and variety of talent engaged, gives promise of an unusually good meeting. Such speakers as Moses Hull, Elizabeth Lowe Watson, Mrs. R. S. Lillie and others; and such mediums as Maude L. Von Freitag, Mr. and Mrs. O. H. Arnold, J. W. Henley, George H. Brower, and others, surely promise a rare treat, a "feast of fat things" from beginning to end.

Mr. Wyllie and Mrs. Gardner, spirit photographers, are advertised to be on the grounds during the entire session. They are both highly thought of by those who know them best, and Mrs. Gardner certainly had evidence of this fact by being last year elected to the responsible position of treasurer of the camp-meeting association, and her portrait graces the directory, in company with those of the other leading officers.

Mrs. Nettie Howell, the financial secretary, and the originator and promoter of these camp-meetings, needs no eulogy from my pen, as she is doubtless well-known to your readers through her zeal and work for the cause of Spiritualism.

W. J. Williams, the president (elected last year), is also president of the Harmonial Society of Los Angeles, of which Mrs. Freitag has for several years been pastor. Attorney J. D. Griffith, the secretary of the association, is one of the stand-bys, one of its true friends and faithful workers. Mrs. E. Ashby, its vice-president, had her efficiency tested in 1901, by having the responsible duties of the president thrown upon her shoulders through the absence of that official in the east.

In short, the array of officers, workers, and all is such as to hold forth the promise of a grand camp-meeting for 1902. ELLA W. MARCHANT.

CHILDREN.

Come to me, O ye children!
For I hear you at your play,
And the questions that perplexed me
Have vanished quite away.

Ye open the eastern windows,
That look towards the sun,
Where thoughts are singing swallows,
And the brooks of morning run.

In your hearts are the birds and the sunshine,
In your thoughts the brooklets flow;
But in mine is the wind of autumn
And the first fall of the snow.

Ah! what would the world be to us
If the children were no more?
We should dread the desert behind us
Worse than the dark before.

What the leaves are to the forest,
With light and air for food,
Ere their sweet and tender juices
Have been hardened into wood—

That to the world are children!
Through them it feels the glow
Of a brighter and sunnier climate
Than reaches the trunks below.

Come to me, O ye children!
And whisper in my ear
What the birds and the winds are singing
In your sunny atmosphere.

For what are all our contrivings,
And the wisdom of our books,
When compared with your caresses,
And the gladness of your looks?

Ye are better than all the ballads
That ever were sung or said;
For ye are living poems,
And all the rest are dead.

VOL. 26. CHICAGO, ILL., AUGUST 23, 1902. NO. 665.

ROMISH HISTORY.

Romish Perversion of Facts Illustrated.

A characteristic sample of Romish perversion of facts is noted and aptly answered by the Chicago Inter Ocean, in an editorial on "Bishop McFaul and the Friars." Says the Inter Ocean:

Bishop McFaul, in his defense of the Friars before the Federation of Catholic Societies on Tuesday, made these distinct charges against American administration in the Philippines:

1. That diplomatists and agents of the government have declared the friars are immoral, and have insisted that they must be removed from the islands and their property be confiscated.

2. That Catholic churches were looted and desecrated by American soldiers, and no attention paid to complaints or claims.

3. That the friars taught the Filipinos purity, and until the American soldiers invaded the islands the Filipinos were unacquainted with certain vices.

4. That of the teachers in the public schools all except nineteen are Protestants, and that Catholics in America have not been asked to send teachers or priests.

All these are questions of fact, not of opinion. As to the first charge, the Filipinos, not the Americans, have declared that the friars are immoral. The Filipinos, not the Americans, have insisted that the friars must be removed from the islands. The Americans, not the Filipinos, have insisted that the property of the friars must not be confiscated. The United States government has made a formal proposition, offering fair compensation for all the friars' lands.

The friars referred to by Bishop McFaul have already been driven from their parishes, not by Americans, but by Catholic Filipinos. The Filipinos having declared that these friars shall not return to their parishes, the United States government has conferred with the Vatican as to the practicability of substituting for the friars American or other priests acceptable to the Catholic Filipinos.

The Vatican has agreed that such substitution shall be made, but a prominent prelate is authority for the statement that no other country, not even Spain, is willing to receive the friars. The truth is that all charges against the friars have been made by Catholics, and that the friars have been protected up to date by the United States government.

The second charge, that Catholic churches in the Philippine islands were looted and desecrated by American soldiers, was fully investigated in 1900 by prominent Catholics and pronounced unwarranted. Complaints as to the desecration and use of church property by soldiers received prompt attention, and the United States government has signified its willingness to pass upon all claims for damages or for rent of church property used by the army.

The third declaration, that the friars taught the Filipinos purity and that the American soldiers taught them the opposite, is denied by the Filipinos themselves. Prominent Filipinos, from Aguinaldo down, charge the friars with the grossest immorality and with practices that made it impossible for the Filipino people ever to accept them as religious teachers. No American has made this charge. On the other hand, prominent Catholics in the Philippines have testified to the good character and influence of the American soldiers.

The complaint that the teachers in the public schools are all Protestants except a very few has been officially answered by Acting Governor Wright, by the Secretary of War, and by Catholic priests familiar with the situation in the Philippines. All the American Catholic teachers who applied for positions in the public schools of Manila, and who passed the examination, were given places.

There are now two American Catholic teachers in the normal school and five in the Manila city schools. The native teachers in the city number 140, and all are Catholics. There are employed in the public schools in the Philippines 3,480 native teachers, and all are Catholics.

The statement that the Catholics in America had not been asked to send teachers or priests to the Philippines is authoritatively denied by the American prelates whose advice was asked by the Vatican. Cardinal Rampolla said to Judge Taft that if a thousand American priests should offer their services for the Philippines the Catholic authorities would hesitate to accept them, for the priests were needed in the United States as much as in the Philippines.

The truth is that American methods have been introduced in the Philippines with the hearty approval of Catholics as well as Protestants who are on the ground, and violent attacks on American policy, such as that made by Bishop McFaul, will not change the policy, nor will it contribute to harmony in the Catholic church.

This Romish bishop and his co-workers are simply carrying on the old, old Romish practice of perverting facts current and facts of history for the purpose of putting non-Romanists in the wrong, and aiding the aggrandizement of the Catholic church by a systematic tissue of false statements.

This plan has been characteristic of Romish methods from the earliest period of the church's existence. History has been distorted out of resemblance to actual truth, and apparent resemblance has only served the purpose of deception and imposture, to further the designs and establish the power and influence of the priesthood and the church.

It is not too much to say that the whole structure of the Romish church is based upon and propped up by a systematic series of forgeries, false claims, perversions of history, and everything of the kind that the cunning brains and hands of lying monks, friars and priests could invent.

These statements and charges put forth by this Romish convention, will be quoted by future Romish historians and go down in Catholic histories, to be taught in their blessed parochial schools as veritable and reliable historical facts. All for the glory of God and the Catholic church. X-RAY.

In all meanness there is a defect of intellect as well as of heart. And even the cleverness of avarice is but the cunning of imbecility.—Bulwer.

Just laws are no restraint upon the freedom of the good, for a good man desires nothing which a just law will interfere with.—Froude.

DR. PHELON'S LETTER.

Brief Notes on Various Matters of Interest.

It is one of the peculiarities of the climate of this wonderful state, while we have the wet and dry seasons, during which we have rain and no rain, occasionally, the ocean sends up more clouds than the specific gravity of the atmosphere can carry, or possibly hold; then the water must fall. Such was the case last night. The whole of San Francisco looks as if it had been deluged by a heavy, summer shower. If a wayfarer had been abroad in it, he would have been conscious only of a dense, moist cloud seeping through his clothing. It helps out the irrigating facilities, however. The plants and trees seem to rejoice in it and grow strong and healthy.

The politics of this state are in a very acrimonious mood, just at present. The struggle is taking on the same ghastly light as has previously pervaded the appeals (?) to the people. The honest desire for the general good of the whole is on one side, and the Pacific Railroad management allied with and backing certain men of the baser sort. The situation is very much as described by an old settler, who talking of a mutual friend, to a pard who had inquired of his welfare, said: "Wa-al, he went out West, mixed up with politics and a rope, and kinder got discouraged, like." If this does not happen this time, it is because they have found other ways than a rope to shut off a man's wind.

The prospect of profit for our fruit ranchers has never been better than now. When another transcontinental line or two shall have completed its connections with this coast, the farmer will have a chance to get a per cent, at least, on his labor and time, instead of, as now, being compelled to do all the work and run all the risk; while the carrying company coolly gobbled all the returns. How much adjusting this old earth and its people need! Will we ever get it finished?

We suppose the readers of The Progressive Thinker are more or less interested in Tracy, the outlaw, as a psychological study. The qualities he exhibited, we call the blustering bravado of a criminal desperado. How do they differ from the same traits in the Boer leaders, which we so much admire. But we had other names for them, such as patriotic heroism, endurance and love of country. "How big was Alexander, pa?" is the question of the world to-day. At the head of a state and an army, he is legitimate. By himself, he becomes a wandering outlaw, his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him, with a price set upon his head. In spite of the "run amuck," he has given the authorities, there was something exhibited, up to his last act, that the world admires, while in no sense, can it condone, lest the foundations of society, or organized concentration, fall out, and the savagery of the desert come back upon us.

The annual convention of the State Spiritualists Association is set for the 5th, 6th and 7th of September next. It bids fair to be a successful and harmonious gathering. The president, M. S. Norton, is an indefatigable worker, a cool, level-headed, business man and an enthusiastic Spiritualist, the right man in the right place. Through his persistent efforts, the cause of Spiritualism has won respect from outside parties, and those who would still attack us if they dared. Why are there not more such souls granted us? A large number of our best local workers are now engaged at the various camps, and in their recreation travels. We hear that Colville is to be again in California, this winter, on his return from his foreign labors.

A little item is going the rounds of newspaperdom, to the effect that a Kentucky Methodist preacher has once more declared that the disputed statement that Jonah swallowed the whale, is absolutely correct. How often in these days we find proof of the expression, "the zeal of thine house has eaten me up." It is so hard for many to distinguish between parable and fact, even in our day.

We have had the pleasure of a visit from Prof. John Uri Lloyd, whose attainments in the occult, of both thought and speech is before the reading public, in his inimitable book, "Etidorpha," a record of the adventures of "The man who did it," in the under world. It is a country of which we hear much and know but little. The Prof is one of those rare men who are so full of much entertaining knowledge, that he is continually running over to the delight and instruction of those who may be privileged to listen.

Mrs. Lillian M. Parkins, whom many of your readers know, is now located at Napa, in this state. She has started a Universal Institute. In connection therewith she has a Free Circulating Library, whose books can be had by any one who has postal facilities. Particulars can be obtained by addressing her as above. She is a very unworldly woman, of the household of Spiritual Faith, who makes and retains many friends.

We notice the death, by accident, of Lucy Hovey, a public school teacher of Ogden, Utah. She was a come-outer from the Mormon church, and a radical Socialist. Her death is much to be deplored. W. P. PHELON, M. D.

A Leading Question.

Is Mediumship Demoralizing? J. S. Loveland Presents His Views.

In No. 662 of The Progressive Thinker, Bro. Lyman C. Howe has an admirable article in reply to the question at the head of this article. But it is one of such immense importance that one or two newspaper articles will not suffice for a complete answer, and I wish to contribute a little in that direction.

Bro. Howe most clearly indicates that ignorance is, and must be the cause of all forms of demoralization.

Years ago I discovered this fact, and in my book on Mediumship, lectures and articles in the press, I have sought to awaken and stimulate an interest in studying the science of the mediumistic conditions, so far as the influence of physiology was concerned. But I am sorry to say that, to a very great extent, Spiritualists, and mediums most of all, have been averse to any such study.

Ignorance has been preferred to knowledge, with the result that a great amount of the plainest hypnotic and mesmeric phenomena are palmed off upon an ignorant and credulous public as spirit manifestations.

And we have the cry of fraud from one end of the land to the other.

Of course, there is more or less fraud, but it is largely the fraud of ignorance.

The auto-hypnotized psychics are fully convinced that they are spirit mediums, and that their telepathic and psychometric readings are from decarnate spirits. And the majority of Spiritualists are in the same delusion.

Why?

Because of ignorance.

They have taken no pains to inform themselves of the powers of the human spirit while still in the body, and hence persist in assuming that discarnate spirits only can do the acts which all well-informed persons know are done by those still in the flesh.

But what is the physiological condition of mediumship?

I answer, Sleep.

The trance is sleep, and some degree of trance is involved in all phases of mediumship.

There are many degrees of sleep, from simple drowsiness to profound slumber. Sleep is caused by the recession of the nervous circulation from the brain and nerves of wakeful activity to those of organic life. Hence, it is rest and recuperation. The conclusion would be that the trance of itself could not be injurious, and this is most emphatically true, for there is no more injury from the hypnotic, mesmeric or psychic trance than from natural sleep.

But some phases of natural sleep are not restful. A partial, broken, dreamy sleep is exhausting instead of restful. The nerve circulation is deranged. This is largely the case in trance mediumship. The pure sleep of the trance is broken into by the influence—the suggestions of other minds—spirits in or out of the body.

All activity of mind as well as body involve expenditure or waste of nerve energy. Physiological righteousness demands that the sleep conditions should be used exclusively for rest and recuperation, and that it should be undisturbed. But hypnotic experimentation and mediumistic manifestation are violations of physiologic laws. It is physiological unrighteousness. It can be indulged in for a time with no marked ill effects, just as one can go without sleep for a night without illness.

But persistence will tell in time.

No one can fail to see that if the circulation of the blood was disturbed by internal or external causes, to any great extent, the result would be a serious illness; but it is no more true of the blood than of the nerve circulation.

The mental scientist will tell you that all disease has its origin in mental conditions, and, while we may say that this is an extreme statement, it is nevertheless very largely true, because mind so fully controls the nerve energy or circulation on which the recuperation of the physical system so entirely depends.

The induction of sleep, in any way, is the inauguration of the recuperative processes of organic life. But hypnotic or mediumistic experiments disturb, while they do not entirely break up the sleep conditions. They induce a dual action in the system, which in reality is an antagonistic one. It interferes with the rest of the day brain and its nervous system; and it abstracts from the organic system a portion of the energy needed for the repair of wastes or recuperation.

Now, any one can see that a continuous repetition of trance conditions must, in the very nature of things, result in nerve exhaustion and prostration, of which we have seen so much in our mediums, followed by early death in some cases, and a resort to stimulants and anodynes in others.

Perhaps some will say that mediumship is physiologically demoralizing according to my own showing.

I admit this as a general proposition. But there are several other facts which have to be taken into consideration for a correct understanding of the whole question. Nature is equal to all her necessities, and in providing for all demands she creates a surplus—a reserve. There are surplus blossoms on the trees—surplus germs in animal and vegetable life.

In the human organization there are surplus or reserved energies.

In health, nature continually creates them. They are stored in the plexuses and ganglia, which are the brain of organic life. These are the energies used in producing mediumistic phenomena, and if not too long and too often drawn upon the medium may retain good physical health for a long period.

Again, we find great difference in the innate or constitutional vitality of persons. A vast number die in childhood and youth, while a few survive to 75 and 100 years. Some can endure the poison of alchohol, opium or tobacco for many years, while with most life is shortened. So we will find a very few who have survived mediumship to a good old age, but the vast majority have gone in early life or middle age.

I think I have shown that the demoralizing influence of mediumship is mainly physical, and hence mostly due to ignorance. And, so far as the immoralism of fraud and chentery is concerned, it has no more to do with mediumship than the brutality of the prize ring is the necessary result of physical strength. Possibly some real mediums make use of their powers to abstract the shekels from credulous dupes, but the traveling frauds, so-called, are simply shysters who understand most thoroughly how to play the gullibly ignorant.

But I should not be doing justice to the subject if I did not allude to another form of mediumistic demoralization. It is the most far-reaching and the most dangerous of all; and yet it is not a legitimate outgrowth of mediumship, but a retention of the superstitions of the past. I refer to that phase of mediumship which talks of "my controls," "my guides," and "I am only an instrument in the hands of the higher powers." These phrases imply a renunciation of selfhood; a submission to a person or persons or power we do not know.

It is casting our reason to the winds, and blindly following an impulse we know not where. It is ignorantly assuming that somebody of some other world knows more about this world and its workings and duties than ourselves. It is shirking the duty of personally learning what we need and ought to know, and appropriating some one's labor. It thus cultivates laziness and ignorance, on the plea that the spirits will do it.

Now, this old superstition of a "familiar spirit," "control" or "guide," has done more than all else to put and keep ignorance on the spiritual platform, and pave the way for other reprehensible things which we deplore. But I repeat that it is no part of real mediumship, but an incidental influence injected from the superstitions of the old religion. If space allowed, I could show that all or nearly all the unlovely features and happenings of the spiritual movement have been due entirely to this blind and superstitious submission of the mediums to be "instruments to spirit controls and guides." Only a scientific education can save us from a constant repetition of these unfortunate blunders. J. S. LOVELAND.

TWILIGHT.

The shadows are veiling the brow of the hills,
And vapors are soothing the murmuring rills,
While Twilight, the daughter of Sunshine and Shade,
Is queen of the evening, in glory arrayed.

She gracefully mantles the waning of day,
And welcomes the evening in golden array,
Yet softens the glimmering curtain of light
With shadows that melt on the bosom of night.

Triumphant she rides on the billows of fire,
With chaplet of jewels in queenly attire;
In gold-tinted armor she flashes her blade,
And marshals the stars in their nightly parade!

With coursers unheeded, undaunted they run,
Whose footsteps all follow the path of the sun;
When softly unfolding her curtain of blue,
All spangled with silver, she waves her adieu.

Thus onward forever, with banners unfurled,
Her halo of glory enraptures the world;
While sentinel stars on the borders of night
Now herald the vast constellation of light.

In silence its millions of systems revolved;
In silence its problems are ever unsolved;
In silence we gazed on the boundless domains,
Where infinite order and harmony reigns.

When lo! from the verge of the measureless deep,
Where numberless ages all silently sleep,
Aurora emerges from cycles unborn,
With Twilight to hail the glad tidings of morn.

United they mingle in loving embrace,
Expanding their pinions new regions to grace;
Dissolving the shadows with Orient light,
And melting the stars from the bosom of night.

While Earth, in response to the language of flowers,
In rapture arouses from star-lighted bowers;
Unveiling her features, she wendeth her way
To the radiant realms of the monarch of day.

The birds sweetly carol their matinal lays,
And nature responds with her chorus of praise;
While dewdrops that fell by invisible showers,
Are jewels aflame on the bosom of flowers.

Thus oft in our pathway from darkness forlorn
The tear-drops of night are the jewels of morn,
And hopes that are buried and shrouded in gloom,
Like seeds are well-planted in fragrance to bloom.

Every sigh that is hushed on the bosom of night
Is a song as it wakens, and welcomes the light;
While hope, brightly dawning, illumines the way
From Twilight of Morning to Infinite day. —Warren Sumner Barlow.

FROM "IN MEMORIAM."

O, yet we trust that somehow good
Will be the final goal of ill,
To pangs of nature, sins of will,
Defects of doubt, and taints of blood;

That nothing walks with aimless feet;
That not one life shall be destroyed,
Or cast as rubbish to the void,
When God hath made the pile complete;

That not a worm is cloven in vain,
That not a moth with vain desire
Is shriveled in a fruitless fire,
Or but subserves another's gain.

So runs my dream: But what am I?
An infant crying in the night;
An infant crying for the light;
And with no language but a cry.

The wish that of the living whole
No life may fall beyond the grave,
Derives it not from what we have
The likest God within the soul?

Are God and Nature then at strife,
That Nature lends such evil dreams
So careless of the type she seems,
So careless of the single life;

That I, considering everywhere
Her secret meaning in her deeds,
And finding that of fifty seeds
She often brings but one to bear.

I falter where I firmly trod,
And falling with the weight of cares
Upon the great world's altar-stairs
That slope thro' darkness up to God,

I stretch lame hands of faith, and grope,
And gather dust and chaff, and call
To what I feel is Lord of all,
And faintly trust the larger hope.

THE CHURCH.

Influences That Have Made the Church of To-Day.

What antecedents and influences have led up in the ages to the doctrines and practices of the church of to-day? The church didn't drop down out of the clouds, nor grow up out of the ground in a day's time; but is the result to date of a long line of evolution, beginning at the Jew. And human nature and environment have had too much to do with this evolution.

The Jews were pre-eminently a pious people, much given to worshiping and sacrificing toward the Gods. Not only did they habitually speak of what God did, instead of what the things of the world did, but they were constantly of the opinion that God liberally rewarded those who were loyal to him, and punished those who were disloyal. Having a great deal of vanity, and not much scientific knowledge, it was easy for the Jew to suppose he was the chosen people of God and that the whole universe was made for man. Finally the Jew ran very much to prophets; and the prophets were expected to do miracles as a "sign" that they were men of God, and could therefore be trusted in anything they said. Evidently the church of to-day has inherited largely from the Old Testament Jew.

But some two thousand years ago a great reformer rose in Israel; and his "doctrines" not only caused his death but served as the basis of a departure called Christianity. The central idea in Christ's life and teachings was a brotherly love which showed itself in helpfulness. The early church was built that way, its members holding all things in common. What the church of to-day has inherited from Christ is seen in its humanitarian side. But the church now is more Pauline than Christian.

Among the persecutors of the early Christians was one named Paul. But as Paul journeyed one day a great light shone round about him, and the question arose as to whether he was doing the proper thing in persecuting the Christians. Some do say that the question came up in Paul's own mind, because the light broke in on him that the Christians were in sore need of an able organizer and propagandist, and that he, Paul, was the man for the job and for the name it would give him. Anyway, Paul suddenly became the most zealous of Christians, and straightway set about his work of building up the organization. But Paul, the able organizer that he was, saw that the foundations must be laid all right to build on. Christ, the reformer who died at the hands of the priesthood for teaching that "right living" was more important than temple worship, was well enough as the founder of an ethical or humanitarian society. But to be the founder of a great religion he must be the Son of God who died not only to save the Jew but the Gentile world also. Thus was the church given a broad field to cover, and all people who were at all anxious to be saved must enter the church or go without salvation. If you accept the salvation, a luminous future was before you; if not, your prospects were most dismal. Your salvation depended on faith, faith in the doctrines of the church.

Oh no. It will not do to leave St. Paul out of the calculation in computing the "forces" that have led up to the church as we have it to-day. More sermons are preached from Paul than from Christ. But for the supernatural stamp put upon it by St. Paul and the efficacy of faith, Christianity could not have had its phenomenal success. Not infrequently Christianity is called the Pauline religion.

About the beginning of our era Greek philosophy and Oriental Mysticism met with each other at Alexandria, and the result was Neo-Platonism—a kind of conglomeration of religion and philosophy, faith and reason. With the Neo-Platonists, who were the wisest of men then, the Church Fathers had a word warfare which lasted some three centuries; at the end of which the Popes took charge of the church. Though the Church Fathers won the fight, their own views were greatly modified by this encounter with the Neo-Platonists. It is said that the church got "trinity" from the Neo-Platonists. Indeed a great deal that the Church Fathers conceded to these pesky Neo-Platonists would not make good Sunday reading for the orthodox world to-day. The influence which the Neo-Platonists had in determining church doctrines must not therefore be left out of the calculation.

And, of course, the Catholic church in the middle and dark ages must come in for a large share in shaping the doctrines and practices of the church. The one purpose of the priesthood seems to have been to so shape the church as to give themselves the greatest authority over the people and the largest revenue. Of course, at the "Reformation" some of the grosser additions made by the Catholics were left off by the Protestants. All the same, much of doctrine and practice in the church to-day was put there by the Catholics in the days when kings were made to kiss the Pope's big toe.

And you must not ignore Paradise Lost and Watts' Hymns. Often the parson quotes from these, thinking himself, perhaps, that he is repeating scripture.

Finally, the parson himself must be taken into the account. The man in the pulpit is an interpreter, and his deliverances take on much coloring from his own intellectual and emotional character.

Therefore, if it happens you that you are in the tabernacle sitting under the supposed drippings of the gospel, you must not ask the parson, Where did you get that hat? But you may wonder where his ideas came from. From his own head, from Watts' Hymns and Paradise Lost, from the Catholics, from the Neo-Platonists, from Paul, from Christ—or from the Old Testament writers. And how much did the old Jews have from the Egyptians? And finally it might be in order to wonder what sense there is in the parson's deliverances—no matter where they came from originally.

It is a most discouraging circumstance that a divine institution, such as the church claims to be, has been subject to so much and such radical changes, and from extraneous influences. One would expect in a divine institution much greater definiteness and stability. Yet thusly it is.

And it would seem that human nature and extraneous influences are not yet done with the church, and that the church is not to be allowed to stand still in any place. It is science and the general intellectual character of this age which now insist on remodeling the divine institution. The effect is not so perceptible in orthodox churches, but the liberal churches seem to have gone back to Christ, the reformer, for their inspiration, and to the Neo-Platonists for their ideas of God and faith. The country parson, Watts' Hymns and Paradise Lost, the Catholics, Pauline religion, and the Biblical stories, seem to be losing their grip on the situation. Verily, the world is chock full of mutations, and even the divine institutions do not escape them.

SOPHISTRIES OF HUDSON.

His Assumption of an Objective and a Subjective Mind.

To the Editor:—I have been recently much interested in your exposure of what you very properly call the "Sophistries of Hudson." I am a friend of Mr. Hudson, and was his neighbor when he wrote the books to which you have alluded. We had practiced hypnotism together for some years, and he paid me the compliment of bringing his book on Psychic Phenomena and reading portions of it to me in manuscript and asking my judgment thereon. I was compelled to tell him that, in my opinion, he had not made a coherent and reasonable book, for the very same reason that theological works are to be rejected, namely, because he took his premises for granted. He wanted his "subjective mind," he said, in order to explain the phenomena of Spiritualism, clairvoyance and telepathy. Ignoring for the moment the question of the reappearance of our dead friends, I asked him if he considered that mind-reading and clairvoyance had been scientifically demonstrated. He assumed that they had, he said. But when I offered him a goodly sum of money to produce those phenomena in my presence, he did not accept the proposition, but preferred to go on with his book without paying attention to such trifles.

Why does Mr. Hudson limit his hypothesis to two varieties of mind? If some mental processes can be explained on the assumption that every individual has an objective and a subjective mind, why could they not be much more completely explained by the assumption that he has also the projective, dejective, and rejective minds? Surely, a projective mind is necessary to enable the proprietor of it to put forth new theories to explain various alleged mental disturbances; a rejective mind might be useful in enabling him to cast out and fling away all facts which do not match his theories; and a dejective mind is absolutely indispensable to the production of the pessimist when he finds that one of the first requirements of science is demonstration. When we reflect upon the versatility of mental images and the exceeding rapidity of thought, it seems as if a man with a hypothesis to support might find even more than five sorts of mental consciousness to be useful.

The amusing peculiarity of Mr. Hudson's method is that he discards the phenomena of Spiritualism while he accepts as altogether too obvious and commonplace to need illustration the allegations of mind readers, thought transferers, and clairvoyants that they can instantly tell what is going on in other regions of the earth! It is singular that a man whose mind has a certain method in its operation should not perceive this strange incongruity. No; if Spiritualism (which Mr. Hudson affectedly calls "spiritism"), clairvoyance and telepathy be actual phenomena, they must be explained in some other way than by a process of mental multiplication. Life and Death.

How short a time in eternal existence is earth life. But a few, short fleeting years do we dwell in this land of sunshine and shadow; then we are set free by death. After death we will progress onward into that higher life, which is to the freed spirit what the air and fields are to the butterfly after it emerges from its covering and wings its way over hill and dale.

Some there are who speak of death with horror, as something they wish to avoid thinking of. They believe earthly life is the only existence where they can work and think.

To many, death ends all. To others, it is to send them either to the burning pit or to the harpers around the throne of Jehovah.

To Spiritualists, life is a training school, a preparatory state wherein to live a pure life and help others. Then when death comes the weary mortal body is laid aside; and the spirit rises to life immortal and eternal progression.

How beautiful is the knowledge of Spiritualism. How grand to receive messages from the arisen dead.

This world would undoubtedly become better in every way if more people would investigate the phenomena and study the spiritual philosophy.

There is truth in many religions, and perhaps the Spiritualists are sometimes in error; but there is no faith which soothes the sorrowing, as the knowledge that our dead are not dead, but are alive and often with us.

PLATO'S SPIRITUALISM.

His Thought and Purpose Amid the Athens of His Day.

Alas! To very many Plato is only a name. It is high time that those who have enjoyed the privilege of leisure, in this work-day world, and "the dear delights of quiet studies," should share their treasures with the readers of your useful—yes your "blessed" journal, Blessed at least in this, that many truths are spoken man-fashion, and the motions of the human heart, and the great truths of the spirit, are not hoodwinked and toyed and juggled with, as gamblers' counters, with which to swindle the unsuspecting children of men.

Let us look at Greece as it was in the old days, twenty-five centuries ago, and try to make a sketch of Plato—lovingly called the "Divine Plato"—even in his habit as he lived.

Sun-kissed Athens is best pictured in its wondrous atmosphere, in the lines of that gallant spirit, Lowell:

"And what is so rare as a day in June?
Then, if ever, come perfect days;
Then heaven tries the earth if it be in tune,
And over it softly her warm ear lays:
Whether we look or whether we listen,
We hear life murmur, or see it glisten;
Every clod feels a stir of might,
An instinct within it that reaches and towers,
And, groping blindly above it for light,
Climbs to a soul in grass and flowers."

Then of the city and the festivities of the people. How did they enjoy themselves? What was their method? What was a "good time" to the Athenian citizen?

For instance, the Panathenaea was a festival dedicated to Minerva—goddess of wisdom; in which the citizens of Athens of all classes and ages were represented. It was held once in five years and lasted for several days, during which they had a race through the streets with torches. A mimic sea fight. Performances on musical instruments—choruses by hundreds of voices. Dramatic representations, dances by young boys in armor. The sacred garments of Minerva embroidered with gold, and two young virgins appointed to the task, was carried in procession through the streets of Athens to her magnificent temple—the Parthenon.

There were troops of young girls wreathed in flowers, and carrying baskets and vases. The most vigorous of the old men carrying olive branches. Animals for sacrifice, covered with garlands. Middle aged men with shields and spears, young men crowned with millet, singing hymns. Foreigners and their families bearing boats, and bands of young children in festal robes. Altogether a joyous throng. The occasion was considered so holy, and they coupled rejoicing so heartily with their religion, that all prisoners were released, as proof of the general joy. Look at another:

The Festival of Dionysia, or Bacchanalia, in honor of Bacchus. This was celebrated when the vines begin to bud. The life again stirs in the form. The oldest preacher of the resurrection is Nature. Ages before there was any Christendom she preached it with all the voices of the Spring; preached it in the bud, and in the young grass lifting itself above the chilly ground and waving a welcome to the warming skies; preached it in the white crocus and the purple violet and the azure hyacinth, the ascension robes of the soil.

Thus the Greeks and others celebrated the annual miracle of the risen Sun God. These holidays of ours are simply their holidays under other names. Many of our festivals are so ancient that no man knows when they began. The church found them and adopted them, and we, to-day, simply do what the old heathen world did before us; but we do it in another spirit.

The ancients celebrated the resurrection of the earth spirit from the grave of winter: We celebrate the resurrection of the human spirit from the grave of sensuality. They celebrated the resurrection of Nature; we the resurrection of Man.

At the feast of Bacchus the magistrates and chief priests presided. In the daytime they had feasts, and music and dramatics. In the evening processions of men and women went about dancing, shouting and feigning intoxication, making all manner of antics: they were masked and crowned with ivy or grape leaves, and dressed in fawn skins to imitate Pan, Silenus, the Satyrs and other attendants of Bacchus. Much noise was of course indispensable, with the blare of trumpets. They carried drinking cups and spears twined with ivy—poles terminating in a pine cone, or surmounted by an emblem of generation to signify the fructifying power of the sun upon the earth in spring time.

These emblems were transferred from the worship of Osiris in Egypt to Greece, where it was called the "phallus," and so on to Rome. All labor was suspended, prisoners liberated, friends interchanged presents. Thus was commemorated the return of the sun, the giver of life, from the winter solstice, to revivify the vineyards and give flavor to the grape juice.

A word as to the "spiritual mediums" of that day. The Greek and Roman "Sibyls" were women supposed to be inspired by the "gods" (angels). Apollo was believed to throw them into a kind of ecstacy or trance, in which they could foresee the future.

One very celebrated medium was the Cumaean Sibyl, said to have been the writer of the Sibylline books. The "Oracle" of Delphi was especially famous. A medium or oracle at Butes told Cambyses that he would die in Ecbatana. Cambyses, you remember, was the son and successor of Cyrus the Great, Emperor of Persia. He reigned about seven years, adding Egypt to his dominions. He supposed that Ecbatana was the city of that name in Medea and carefully avoided the place. But some years after, while suffering from a wound, he dismounted to rest in a village in Assyria. He felt that he must die—he inquired the name of the place and they told him it was Ecbatana. Thus was the prophecy fulfilled.

Destiny seems to have been an "Odd Fellow" in those days. But in the "fullness of time" came Plato upon the scene. He was born 429 B. C., and was a favorite pupil of Socrates. In due time he developed his own philosophy. He taught the existence of one Supreme Soul of the world, without beginning, end, or change. The one unchanging Being amid worlds of change. It was the Eternal Now of consciousness. Prior to all beings and above all. The author of all things, even the ethereal sphere, and of all below it. He is Life, Counsel, Intuition and Light. The same that drew all things visible and invisible out of naught or chaos. The unconditioned, outer darkness. His Power reduces chaos to order. Plato supposed Good and matter to be eternally distinct principles, opposite in their nature. Matter was the outer covering, the receptacle of all forms, the femininity, "Mother Nature" as we say, and was, from its refractory nature, considered the originator of evil.

He considered the first emanation from God was the mind, immortal, indivisible, unchangeable, a portion of deity itself.

This great Power being mingled with the feminine principle of matter (Light and Darkness?) caused the birth of a third, which he calls the Soul of the World, and believed it to be the pervading and animating principle of the universe.

The Inner life of all things was, to him, spirit. The Platonic Trinity was figurative. It related to the attributes of the Divine Being, not to Persons. It was a metaphysical and philosophic way of saying that the Divine principle of Good by agency of his wisdom, produced, a manifestation of his Ideas, which was the model world, according to which this visible earth was made. In the same metaphysical way he often calls the world the son or child of God. He means that the model world of Ideas was Eternal, being co-existent with the Divine Mind, but that this inferior world was produced by union with matter. The three states, the Ethereal or luminous, the Aerial or atmospheric, and the Material.

The Ethereal is the pure region and light of heaven. There are the stars, the former residences of our souls before we dipped once again into matter for further development. That is the Permanent world. There indeed are the real ideal types of being, fresh from the Divine Mind.

Plato's central idea is that all things come from inward formations of causation, or spirit. "Forms are incarnations or materializations of intelligent living Forces. Mind is primary; matter follows the attraction of invisible spirit causes, which are self-conscious and Divine."

We electroplate forms with metal, it may be with gold, silver, nickel. The metal flows over the pre-existent forms. So it is with the embodiment or materializations: spirit forms becoming covered with matter and hence knowable through the senses.

In the intellectual worlds all is beautiful, harmonious, transparent to the spirit sight. Fruits, flowers, birds, all breathing the luminous ether, as we breathe air, and drinking water which is purer than air.

We who live in this profound abyss, at the bottom of an ocean of atmospheric air, imagine that we are in an elevated place, and we call the atmosphere heaven. It is as if a man were looking at sun and stars from the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean, and seeing their reflection in the water, should imagine the sea water itself was the sky. If we had wings to rise on high, we should see that there is the true heaven, the true light and the true, though darkened, earth.

As in the ocean all is troubled, brackish from the salts and impurities which abound, so in this present "bank and shoal of time" all is deformed and ruined in comparison with that primitive world, where the idea has its perfect expression.

Our perceptions (Ideas) of the "True and the Beautiful" are really the recollections of what the soul formerly saw, when it dwelt in the diviner life, in a perfect state of Being. There it despised what we now consider realities, and it was supernally elevated to the contemplation of the true, in the spirit. Unless the soul of man had once perceived divine realities, it could not have entered the body of a human form. Few souls remember the sacred mysteries they once perceived and these when they behold any similitude of supernal forms are astonished, and as it were, caught up, rapt above themselves. But at the same time they are ignorant of what this ecstasy may be, because they are not endowed with that perfect clear perception" which is truth. The spiritual vision or inner life, not having sufficiently purified itself from its sensual contaminations, inherited from ancestry and contracted from environment.

Of the multitude of intermediate spirits between God and man, he says: "Their office is to convey and interpret to the Gods (angels) the prayers and offerings of men, and bring to men the commands of the Gods."

These "Daemons" are the source of all prophecy, and of the arts of priests in relation to sacrifice, consecration and conjurations. All such communications are carried on by means of these spirit bodies both in sleeping and in waking.

In Plato's psychology man consists of three parts: (1) The Spirit or inner life, (2) The Rational mind—a sort of mirror—reflecting between spirit and matter: and (3) the dark, material body. Thus man was a microcosm or type in little of the entire cosmic sphere.

As we rest in reverie meditating his cosmic conception with its Harmony and its "Ideal Principles" we seem to drift into the melodious mood say of Chopin's Nocturnes, or Schuberth's Serenade—or the sweet slumber songs of the masters of melody.

We dream deliciously into "The Twilight" thought of Lowell:

"Sometimes a breath floats by me,
An odor from Dreamland sent,
Which makes the ghost seem night me
Of a something that came and went.
Of a life lived somewhere, I know not
In what diviner sphere:
Of mem'ries that come not and go not
Like music once heard by an ear
That cannot forget or reclaim it;
A something so shy it would shame it
To make it a show;
A something too vague, could I name it,
For others to know.
As though I had lived it and dreamed it
As though I had acted and schemed it
Long ago."

These lines call to memory Plato's doctrine of "Reminiscence." In the "Phaedrus" this conception of a former existence is embodied in one of his famous myths. In this the imaginative powers are seen at their finest.

The soul is compared to a charioteer driving two winged steeds, one mortal, the other immortal; the one ever tending towards the earth, the other seeking always to soar into the sky; there where it may behold those blessed visions of loveliness and of wisdom and goodness, which are the true nurture of the soul. When the chariots of the Gods go forth in mighty and glorious procession, the soul would fain ride forth in their train; but alas! the mortal steed is ever hampering the immortal, and dragging it down.

If the soul yields to this influence and descends to earth, there she takes human form, but in higher or lower degrees, according to the measure of her vision of the truth. She may become a philosopher, a king, a trader, an athlete, a prophet, a poet, a farmer, a sophist, a tyrant. But whatever her lot, according to her manner of life in it, may she rise or sink, still further, even to a beast or a plant.

Only those souls take the form of humanity that have had some vision of eternal truth. And this vision they retain in a measure, even when clogged in mortal clay. And so the soul of man is ever striving and fluttering after something beyond; and specially is she stirred to aspiration by the sight of bodily loveliness. Then above all comes the test of good and evil in the soul. The nature that has been corrupted would fain rush to brutal joys; but the purer nature looks with reverence and wonder at this beauty, it is a revelation from heaven, it is an adumbration of the celestial joys which he still remembers vaguely from the heavenly vision.

Thus pure and holy love becomes a narrow pathway back to heaven. It is a source of happiness unalloyed on earth; it guides the true lovers on upward wings back to the heaven whence they came.

Thus the love that tempts us into sin if it be true Love, works out its redemption, and he "who seeks atonement for the past should woo the angel virtue in the future."

Jesus re-enunciates this doctrine to the present age, the doctrine of prior, that is, eternal existence. He says: "May they learn they are of Thee, and they will surely go back again into the bosom of immensity, from whence they came; and may they learn, through the knowledge of the law, that they have existed co-equal with the almighty whole, and not one jot or tittle of mind or matter can be lost or created anew."

Thus do the reveries of our dear dead past call up to mind the highest, noblest themes of human cogitation, leading us to realize that

"The flush of life may well be seen
Thrilling back over hills and valleys;
The cowslip startles in meadows green,
The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice,
And there's never a leaf or a blade too mean
To be some happy creature's palace."

J. P. COOKE.

A GENTLE REMINDER.

The Urgent Duty of Spiritualists.

Observation has taught me that there are a few imporant duties we owe, many of us, to the cause of Spiritualism and with which a number with whom I am acquainted are decidedly derelict.

First, We who have been led out of darkness, thrown aside old-time beliefs and church dogmas, though holding communion with our arisen loved ones, should strive each and every day to live up to the teachings of Spiritualism and those loved ones. I say the teachings of loved ones, since good spirits will not knowingly give bad advice to their loved ones yet on this plain of life, yet they as well as ourselves may at times err in their judgment concerning the affairs of this side of life, and in which we mortals are in many ways interested.

Second, We should be united, organized, since in union there is strength. United we become a power, but divided we fall. Being divided, careless, derelict, we make no progress, no headway in the eyes of the world and wield no influence with legislative bodies, the law-makers. Why is it thus? Simply because we as Spiritualists have stood idly by and permitted the enemy to dictate to our legislators the bills it (the enemy) wants pushed through. Now what is the result? The bill is passed and becomes a law which the enemy proceeds to have enforced. One law prohibits our healing mediums using their God-given powers in healing the afflicted. Another gives the power to arrest and imprison our phenomenal mediums. Another prohibits the use of clairvoyant powers, etc. These are facts, cold facts, the Spiritualists of the country have had to face, yet, many of them, and especially those who are well-to-do financially, as a rule keep quiet and render little or no assistance to the N. S. A. nor to the little bands of workers here and there throughout this great republic. In the language of that great statesman, Patrick Henry, who while addressing his fellow citizens, urged them to unite and put their shoulders to the wheel, and while addressing them on an important and vital matter, said, "They tell us that we are weak and unable to cope with so formidable an adversary; but when will we be stronger? Will it be the next week or the next year."

History tells the result of persisting effort. Now to you who are prone to procrastination and neglectful of your duty, I would like to ask, how much longer are you going to stand on neutral ground and let the "other fellow" or the "other woman" do the work, furnish the brains, means, etc., to carry on this grand work. Reader, if the shoe fits, give it serious thought, then awaken from your lethargic sleep and put your shoulders to the wheel of progress, right and justice, and the angel world will bless you. More, you who are financially able, and thousands of you are, open up your pocket-books and help promulgate, through our gifted speakers, phenomenal mediums and the press the grand truths to be found nowhere outside of the ranks of Spiritualism.

Third, Are you a subscriber to one or more of the papers published in the interests of Spiritualism? If not, you should become a subscriber at once. I, a Spiritualist, would be ashamed to admit that I was not a subscriber to at least one of the papers published in the interest of a cause that has revolutionized the beliefs of thinking minds of the civilized world. A truth that has freed thousands of imprisoned, creed-bound souls, discarded church dogmas and priestly rule. Support the Spiritualist-papers and they will become a power, as is the secular press to-day. I personally know, I am sorry to say, of a number of families in Canton, the town in which I live, and who call themselves Spiritualists, in whose homes a Spiritualist paper is a stranger (unless loaned to them by some worker); and that which applies to those people will apply to the same lukewarm class in other towns.

To conclude, reader, if you are of that class, brace up and do something for Spiritualism and the papers published in its interest, whose editors work night and day for the cause of truth and the betterment of humanity. The Progressive Thinker, and there is none better, is weekly filled with interesting reading, matter brimful of spiritual food for progressive thinkers. More, with each yearly subscription a valuable up-to-date book is practically given to you. Send in your subscription, then fall in line with the army of active workers for this the grandest cause on the face of the globe.

SPIRIT MESSAGE.

Here all is light and perfect day,
Earth's shadows all have passed away;
My soul is happy and serene,
Here on this "Isle of Evergreen."
My life is crowned with truth and love,
In this bright home of peace above;
There's nothing comes to make me sad,
But everything to make me glad.

My soul is joyous, pure and free,
And loving friends are here with me,
With whom I once sojourned below,
Amid earth-scenes of weal and woe.
We know each other on this side,
And in each other's love abide—
Are free from time, it's toil and strife,
In this sweet home of spirit life.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

SPIRITUAL PRAYERS.

All-merciful Father, may we be so guided, amid all life's changes, that, in all things which shall befall us, we may preserve an equal and tranquil spirit, and our souls be wholly resigned to thy divine will and pleasure; neither murmuring at thy gentle chastisements and fatherly corrections, nor waxing proud and insolent, when the comforts and prosperous successes of this world are multiplied unto us. Fix our thoughts, our hopes, and our desires upon heaven and heavenly things; teach us to use the world as not abusing it, and sincerely repent of all our sins; give us holy purposes of amendment, and spiritual strength and assistance to perform faithfully whatsoever we shall intend piously. Enrich our understandings with an eternal treasure of divine truths, that we may know what thou requirest of us; and do thou, who workest in us to will and to do of thy good pleasure, teach us to obey all thy commandments, and believe all thy revelations; and make us partakers of all thy gracious promises. Teach us, O Lord, so to watch over all our ways, that we may never be surprised by sudden temptation or a careless spirit. Set a watch before our mouths, and keep the door of our lips, that we offend not with our tongues against piety or charity. Be thou, O God, in all our thoughts, that we may speak nothing but what is acceptable unto thee and accordant with thy will, and do nothing but what becometh thy servants, whom thou hast created in thine own image, and made the heirs of everlasting life. Amen.

REINCARNATION.

Mrs. Besant, in an attractive lecture at Brighton lately, introduced the favorite argument in favor of reincarnation—that it is needed to account for the inequalities of human life. We have never been able to see any force in this. It is as easy to imagine re-adjustments and compensations in lives beyond as in repetitions of life here. The reporter says: "Mrs. Besant went on to draw a graphic picture of a child born in a slum foreordained to a life of crime, and another born under favorable circumstances foreordained to a glorious career; and in a passage of striking beauty claimed that the doctrine of reincarnation was the only thing that threw light on this tangle of human life."

The report is a very full one and seems accurate; but this passage surprises us. Mrs. Besant forgot for the moment that the mightiest leaders of the world's thought and hope have come from places equivalent to the slums. Christ was born in a manger, and Buddha had to leave the palace and become a tramp before he could become a Christ. The inference cuts clean across Mrs. Besant's contention.

In this same lecture, Mrs. Besant said: "Many modern Christians ignored the fact that in the words of Christ himself the doctrine of reincarnation was taught when he declared that John the Baptist was Elijah who was to come again." We more than doubt the soundness of this interpretation. It is highly probable that Luke caught the right note when (I. 17) he made the angel say of John: "And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias." But we often notice that Theosophists drive very hard bargains with texts.

ARE ANIMALS IMMORTAL?

The Harbinger of Light recently summarized the teachings from "the other side," given through the mediumship of Andrew Jackson Davis, and the following extract may be interesting and helpful to those of the readers of Light who are perplexed because of the different opinions that are entertained by correspondents regarding the future of animals and men. The Harbinger of Light says:

"The explanation given by Davis of the distinction between man and the lower forms of life, involving the wherefore of man's supremacy, affirms with regard to the mineral, vegetable, and animal world, that the bodies, or forms of existence, each have their essence—a general living soul—which unitedly appertains to the whole body, so that when the physical form disintegrates the soul form which animated it is re-absorbed into the soul mass, to which it pertains. This is not necessarily inconsistent with evolution, because if the soul substance refines by embodiment in form, it communicates on its return its quota of refinement to the mass.

"It is further affirmed that the human form is exceedingly superior to the lower forms of life, because in it Motion, Life, and Sensation are united in one living organized essence, Individualized soul, with which the outward form of man corresponds.

"Each individual human form is in itself a perfect organization, not transcended by any other form, but containing within itself a combination of the qualities of all the lower forms. No improvement can be suggested; physical man is demonstrably the apex of physical evolution, the ultimate of all lower forms, and possesses organized essence transcending that possessed by all other forms. Here are adequate grounds for distinction. Man has reached the highest physical point, and evolution demands a higher plane and finer physical conditions to enable him to develop his interior powers; these conditions we have good reason to believe exist in the next sphere."

EXPERIENCE OF MR. VON BOURG.

The Surbiton Times and Surrey County Journal contained an interesting interview with Mr. Von Bourg, by a representative of that paper, in the course of which Mr. Von Bourg stated that he was eight years of age when he first realized that he was clairvoyant. He continued:

"Let me tell you of an experience which occurred to me, and which convinced me of the truth of what I believe in. I was fourteen years of age at the time and at boarding-school. I had a sister who was a bright, clever girl. We loved each other dearly. All the people of our village were devoted to her. One day she appeared to me in a vision when I was at school. She appeared to me to be lying down and to be very ill. I was terribly distressed by the incident, and I saw her at night in a dream. The next day I received the news that she had died after a few hours' illness, and that the seizure began at the very time that I had the first impression of her.

"In later years I had another experience, and it made a lasting impression on me. I had a brother, who was a promising young engineer. He was twenty-eight; I was in Australia. At the time of which I speak I had influenza and was in bed. One night I was sitting up to eat something when all of a sudden, I saw my brother. He was sitting in the arm-chair in a peculiar manner. I noticed a wound underneath his chin, and his face was as pale as death. 'Has anything happened?' I cried out involuntarily, but then the form of my brother disappeared. The next day I had a cablegram which announced that my brother had had a very serious accident. I saw him again in the same room in the Australian city five weeks later. On the day following that I received another cablegram. My brother had died after having lingered for five weeks. I will not speak of the circumstances which led to his death. At the very hour I first saw him, I afterwards ascertained, he was in the house of a doctor. He had been placed in an armchair. That was exactly how I saw him."

"Have you had communication with him?"

"Yes. I have had a great many messages from him," answered Mr. Von Bourg quietly, "but not from my sister personally. She must have passed to a very high sphere. Certain people, I believe, are never meant to come back. Nevertheless I have received messages from my sister through my brother."

SPONTANEOUS PHENOMENA.

Your correspondent, "R. F. W.," asks why the statement that "no phenomena occur spontaneously" has not been refuted. Under the term phenomena we must include all help, or information, or manifestation, in whatever form appearing, given us by discarnate beings. The reason this statement has not been refuted is because of its naked untruthfulness, so transparent as to deceive no one. In the members of the large family to which I belong I can honestly and fearlessly state that ninety-nine out of every hundred manifestations were entirely unsolicited. Indeed a large number were received in our childhood, before we had even the dimmest notion of their meaning. I will give one instance in my own life:

I intended to travel on a certain Monday morning, by a train starting at 10 a. m. On the Sunday night previous I was warned in a dream not to proceed. I obeyed; and if I had not done so I should in all probability have been killed. This manifestation is a phenomenon (and was given by a specific person who had passed over some years previously; at least this information was shown in the dream).

A second case was quite as spontaneous. A sister died, and on the following day her spirit appeared to another sister, twelve hundred miles away, and gave information of the decease by appearing in the chamber. The death having occurred suddenly was entirely unexpected. I could cite hundreds of cases of all the various kinds of phenomena in our own family alone, all of which were spontaneous. "Help sought is good, help unsought is better." Who would ever dare say such phenomena were not from God? And the same is true of all unsought help, and sought help too, provided the searcher has learned to feel that love is necessary as the armor with which to defeat evil. The Roman Catholics are allowed to pray to certain saints for help. Knowing as we do very fully the history of some of these, can it be claimed on their behalf that such have a greater influence to help than our own friends of tried nobility and strictest and truest love and spirituality?

If with a true spirit ye seek, ye shall find. But there are those who say, "I go," but quickly turn again aside and go not, but revert to the teaching of men held fast by sectarian tenets of a very materialistic kind and as cruel as materialistic.

The only people who need fear any of the so-called dangers of Spiritualism are those whose motive is idle curiosity.

THE EFFECT OF DEATH.

If it is true that messages are received by Spiritualists from their friends and loved ones on "the other side," it is manifest that death does not destroy the individual and that consciousness (which necessarily includes memory, affection, knowledge, desire, and self-consciousness of identity) is perpetuated in the spirit world. The people "over there" not only know themselves but that fact implies that they must also know one another; more fully and accurately, perhaps, than they possibly could do while here. Existence beyond death, to be real life in any sense worthy of that description, must be more intense as regards conscious realization of individual sensibilities, experiences, aspirations, associations, limitations, and acquirements. The continuity of consciousness and the retention of memory which are demonstrated by the proofs of identity which spirit people are continually affording to inquirers, supply the evidence which is needed to confirm the inferential conclusions arrived at by rational spiritual thinkers. The late Rev. George H. Hepworth, speaking of the effect of death upon the departed, said:

"The only change that can occur is the loss of the body, or rather the exchange of a physical for a spiritual body, but not even death can alter those qualities which constitute our characters. Death has unquestioned power over muscles and nerves, but no power whatever over memory or affection. These are beyond his province, and he cannot encroach upon them. Either this is true or immortality is a figment of the imagination, a pleasing delusion, but not a truth. Memory undisturbed and affection unaltered not only render the farewells of those who go as impressive as they are hopeful, but they are the crowning benediction of God on those who remain."

It is in this direction that the phenomena of Spiritualism are of such signal service to humanity; supplying the proofs which we so much need, that our hopes and longings are not traitors but are intuitive perceptions or affirmations of the realities of the spiritual realms.

When we suffer bereavement the one ray of light in the prevailing gloom is the gleam of hope that we shall meet again. We are encouraged to bear our loss with fortitude by the consoling thought that Love is immortal and that our loved ones remember and minister to us. Can it be conceived that these thoughts are false? "There is nothing in the infinite length and breadth of the universe so incredible," exclaimed the Rev. G. H. Hepworth, and Spiritualism affords us the standing ground of knowledge, so that we can thankfully unite with him in the joyous affirmation:

"On the other side we shall meet again; and, meeting, we shall know each other. Mated souls will continue in another life the journey which was interrupted here. Undivided hearts will remain undivided, and under the benign influence of eternity they will come even closer together."

In this view of death we realize that the separation is only an incident; that loving hearts are never really divided; that telepathic communication of soul with soul is as real and true as wireless telegraphy; that the other world is not afar off when love unites us with its tenants, and for us, as for those who have preceded us, it will offer scope and opportunity for growth, self-knowledge, and the fullest realization of the fondest hopes and dreams that have touched our life skies with glory and nerved us to effort and endurance.

In the World Celestial

Is a wonderful book, telling the personal experiences of a man whose dead sweetheart, after appearing to him many times, etherealized, materialized and through trance mediums, has him put into a hypnotic trance by spirit scientists and held in that condition for ten days, which time he spends with her in the celestial spheres and then returns to earth with perfect recollection of what he saw and heard in that realm of the so-called dead. Father Tom and the Pope,

Or a Night at the Vatican.

Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "puttheen," and an Irish recipe for "counwounding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the sperits first," says his Riv'rence; "and then put in the sugar; and remember, every throp of water you put in afther that, spoils the punch." "Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never knewn what dhrink was afore," says he. "It bates the Lachymalchrystal out ov the face," says he—"it's Nectha-r itself, it is, so it is!" says he, wiping his episcopical mouth wid the cuff of his coat. Paper, 25cts.; cloth, 50 cents. . . . OF . . .

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

IN THE REGION OF THE OCCULT.

Some Views Expressed For and Against.

When Prof. Thomson Jay Hudson [says the Chicago Tribune] began to exploit his theories on the duality of the human mind, following along the lines laid down by scientists for years past, he may have cleared away barriers of doubt and wonder concerning what up to that time had been regarded more or less as unexplainable psychological mysteries. At the same time he laid the foundation for a curiosity that being allowed full vent throughout the length and breadth of the land rapidly is bringing to us, especially in the great commercial centers, if the word of eminent physicians is to be believed, a race of men and women who not alone are losing their mental poise but who, in the absence of intelligence necessary to beneficial results from experiments in such a field, become an actual menace to society.

That Hudson and other writers on this subject have warned their readers against delving too deeply into the mysteries of experimental psychology evidently has served only to whet the curiosity thus aroused by these interesting and valuable works, for to-day in London and New York statistics show that fully 40 per cent of the adult population are experimenting in some branch of what has been known as the "occult art." Hypnotism, mesmerism, clairvoyance, clairaudience, second sight, spiritism, and their various phenomena, being classed under the generic head of psychology, have formed a subject too engrossing in its interest to withstand, and to-day experimental work is going on from the humble cottager with his planchette, to the woman of society versed in every technicality of this still mysterious subject.

RAGE OF CRYSTAL GAZING.

Crystal gazing has taken the greatest hold. To-day there are to be found in almost every house along Fifth avenue and in the homes of most of the upper fashionable circles some members of the family who make their daily trips to the so-called mediums, where in the quiet of some secluded and dimly lighted room they are permitted to see in the little sphere of crystal scenes of days they have passed, and, as some of the more ignorant believe, visions of what is to come. And in not a few cases the women of the "upper ten" practice this fascinating study themselves, and act as mediums for their friends. For lately it became more generally known that "medium" powers are not an exclusive birthright, but belong to all who choose to knock correctly at the door.

There is no doubt that superstition still is responsible for the exercises of much of the existing curiosity about psychic science; for notwithstanding the fact that experimental investigation has swept away much of the belief in Spiritualism nevertheless large numbers of persons still have a lurking suspicion that there may be "something in it" after all. Though we have developed from the age of "spooks" and soothsayers and have reached the more practical standpoint of belief and intelligence, superstition and the desire to peer into the unknown remain two ineradicable attributes of the mind. Indeed among some of the seemingly most sane persons the so-called mystical exercises a wonderful and far reaching influence.

Crystal gazing has received a fresh impetus in New York owing to the news recently received of another "test" case, which, while in itself may seem wonderful to many persons, in reality establishes no greater truths than have been proved time and again by the London Society for Psychical Research.

This body, composed of the most eminent scientists of the world, men whose credibility is not open to question, has done more in the way of proving the truth and actuality of psychic phenomena than perhaps ever has been done by any body of investigators before. In short, they have forced science to recognize the fact that psychic phenomena do exist; and by their experiments have placed the subject almost in the class of exact science.

The latest test case affecting crystal gazing concerns a young lawyer of Thames Ditton, London, named Percy Foxwell.

Foxwell left his home in his usual health and spirits. During the afternoon Mrs. Foxwell received a telegram from her husband asking her not to wait dinner, as he could not return until later. From that moment nothing more was seen or heard of him. Mrs. Foxwell was distracted at his disappearance. The police were communicated with and special detectives engaged. Days passed, but nothing transpired. A reward of £50, afterwards increased to £500, was offered for information concerning the whereabouts of the missing lawyer, but still without result. It was in a condition bordering upon despair that Mrs. Foxwell determined to seek the aid of clairvoyance, and to this end she called upon a Mr. von Bourg, a clairvoyant and avowed Spiritualist, who is practicing professionally in the west end of London.

SAW PICTURE OF THE DEAD.

Von Bourg not only gave her many details correctly but through his psychic powers enabled her to see in his crystal, first the form of her husband in life, then his dead body lying in the water. Not only that, Mr. von Bourg and another medium accurately described the position of the water, asserting that it was not more than a mile from the house, that there was grass on the banks, and a drooping tree overhanging where the body was lying.

The mediums declared themselves conscious of severe pains on the left side of the head, and attributed this to the probability that Mr. Foxwell had met with his death by a blow on the left side of the skull.

Subsequently, under the direction of the mediums, the spot indicated by them was sought and found, and the next morning, Mr. Foxwell's body was found not far from the spot by some watermen. At the inquest, held later, the doctors called attention to some slight depression on the left side of the head, possibly due to blows.

On another occasion a friend went to see Von Bourg for a few minutes' conversation. Mr. von Bourg asserts that when shaking hands with his friend a strange repellent feeling came over him—a feeling which in spite of all his efforts he could not shake off. He persuaded his friend to hold the crystal, with the result that von Bourg predicted that within twenty-four hours he would be in the most serious financial difficulties. The sequel of the case was that his friend next morning found himself a ruined man through the extensive embezzlements of one of his employes.

EASY TO EXPLAIN.

Again a lady called upon him professionally. She did not tell him her business at once, but as she sat before him Mr. von Bourg distinctly saw "in his mind's eye" that usually she wore around her neck a long gold chain, although when she entered the apartment that chain was not there. He immediately put the question to her, "You have come to consult me concerning lost jewelry?" The lady admitted such was the fact. A day or two later Mr. von Bourg went to Brighton and there by means of his crystal showed where the missing jewelry would eventually be found. A few days afterwards he received a telegram stating that the jewels had been discovered in the spot that he had predicted—under the edge of a carpet.

While these cases may seem extraordinary to those who have not studied this interesting subject, nevertheless they merely form examples of the A B C of psychic science, and the possibility of such cases would not be questioned by any student of the subject. They form only another proof of the existence of that branch of that phenomena which is described in "Phantasms of the Living," which in the proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research demonstrates the fact that scientific investigators of modern times have proved that even many of the ghost stories which have horrified the minds of the young for ages past in many cases have had strong foundation in fact. A review of this work will establish beyond doubt the fact that phantasms of the dead, as of the living, can be made apparent to the objective senses. Many cases are on record where so-called ghosts have been viewed by several persons at one time, some of them beyond doubt in a normal mental state. The conditions necessary for the projection of such phantasms on the crystal are exactly those that operate in the transferrence of other phantasms made apparent in space to the naked eye, and are easily explainable on the hypothesis established by the theory of the dual mind, when coupled with the law of suggestion.

Once the theory of the dual mind is grasped and one understands the great meaning of the power of suggestion all of these so-called mysterious phenomena easily are understood, and a lightninglike glance is cast not only into the subject itself but into the hitherto laughed at realm of psycho-therapeutic mind healing, which as a religion flourishes under the name of Christian Science.

PROF. HUDSON'S DEFINITION.

Hudson separates the mentality into the "objective" and the "subjective" minds. He clearly describes the difference between the two as follows:

"The objective mind takes cognizance of the objective world. Its media of observation are the five physical senses. It is the outgrowth of man's physical necessities. It is his guide in his struggle with his material environment. Its highest function is that of reasoning.

"The 'subjective' mind takes cognizance of its environment by means independent of the physical senses. It perceives by intuition. It is the seat of the emotions, and the storehouse of memory. It performs its highest functions when the 'objective' senses are in abeyance. It is that intelligence which makes itself manifest in a hypnotic subject when he is in a state of somnambulism.

"In this state many of the most wonderful feats of the 'subjective' mind are performed. It sees without the use of the natural organs of vision, and in this as in many other grades or degrees of the hypnotic state it can be made apparently to leave the body, and travel to distant lands and bring back intelligence of times of the most exact and truthful character. It has also the power to read the thoughts of others even to minutest details, to read the contents of sealed envelopes and closed books. In short it is the 'subjective' mind that possesses what is popularly known as the clairvoyant power, and the ability to apprehend the thoughts of others without the aid of the ordinary objective means of communication.

"IT IS THE SOUL."

"The real distinctive difference between the two minds seems to consist in the fact that the 'objective' mind is merely the function of the physical brain, while the 'subjective' mind is a distinct entity, possessing independent powers and functions, having a mental organization of its own, and being capable of sustaining an existence independently of the body. In other words, it is the soul."

This grasped, much light is thrown onto the subject when we understand that the "subjective" mind (the term is used to prevent confusion) is incapable of inductive reasoning, and is completely under the control of suggestion. The "subjective" mind which reasons only deductively from what it is told (for it accepts as absolute fact every impression conveyed), to a logical issue, often reaches the most improbable conclusions. And it is controllable by its own objective mind, as well as by the objective mind of others. The clairvoyant medium, therefore, may be described as the man who has the power to raise the information possessed by his "subjective" mind to the threshold of his consciousness—his "objective" mind. It should be understood that the power of thought transferrence—which not even the most skeptical scientist longer doubts—exists only between the subjective minds, and those persons are called mediums who can with their subjective minds read the subjective minds of others, and then, as before said, raise them to the threshold of their own consciousness. The facts thus discovered once unfolded to the objective senses of the listener at once are understood as truths.

HOW MESSAGES ARE FLASHED.

The "subjective" mind is most active when the objective mind is dethroned, as in sleep. In the hour of death it is all paramount. It reigns supreme. Is it any wonder then that at such a time if one should be facing death by violence the unconscious thought and desire to acquaint those dear ones at home of the circumstances surrounding our taking off be flashed with lightninglike rapidity from our subjective mind to that of the person or persons most interested? Surely this is the fact, perhaps, in every case, though not always are such messages raised to the conscious mind of the receiver. In such events such as the one described of Foxwell the receiver of the message visits a "medium." The medium at once sees the scene of the disaster. He reads the stricken mind of the wife and finds hidden in the storehouse of her subjective mind the message flashed to it in the moment of death. He tells her of the picture, even to the most minute details of her husband's taking off, and, as in this case, projects the vision of horror on the crystal sphere. It is here the skeptic halts, and it is here that that mysterious hypnosis plays its part. In few cases of crystal reading can the listener see the scenes described by the medium; but when they can be seen it is because the objective mind is dethroned for the time being by hypnosis, and the subjective mind allowed to operate free from the trammels of the objective reason.

It is a fact that few persons can see the visions in the crystal. This is because they are in doubt about them. And it is a well authenticated fact that failure to produce psychic phenomena is not only likely, but almost certain where doubt exists. For this "subjective" mind accepts as fact that doubt, and it can reason only deductively from that premise. Let the "subjective" mind be assured of the fact, and it will accept it with some certainty. Thus it is that so much of the well known phenomena has been attributed by the ignorant to spiritism. The medium has been asked if "the speaker is not John Smith, long since departed." Immediately the reply has been "yes," the "subjective" mind accepting at once as fact the suggestion that it is the spirit of the dead that is talking. And it will enter into the most spirited and logical arguments to prove that such is the fact. Nor should it be taken as an evidence of charlatanism that the medium believes he is in direct communication with the souls of the departed, for often he is operating under laws, natural, but which he does not understand. He knows of the existence of the phenomena and has no hypothesis under which he can explain them other than that of communication with the spirits of the dead.

Clairvoyance and crystal gazing stand really among the simplest of the so-called "occult arts." The person gifted with "second sight" usually is one of a highly nervous temperament, and he—presuming the medium to be a man—is influenced by forces over which he has, personally, little control. The questionable gift of second sight develops usually at an early age. The boy is known as "old fashioned," since his ways are not ways of other boys, and he is more given to brooding than playing. Most of the clairvoyants inform us that in the early teens they insensibly develop the faculty of predicting the future.

DANGER IN EXPERIMENTS.

The great danger to humanity in allowing the "subjective" mind to gain control over the objective senses has been pointed out by the most eminent scientists and physicians. Its danger lies in the fact that the "subjective" mind has no power of reason by induction, and it does not require a vast sweep of the imagination to show that under such a system of life how far moral degradation can reach. Much more is it evident, then, how dangerous it is to allow the "objective" reason to be dethroned by a power when the laws under which that power operates are not understood; yet the number of persons in this class is legion. And daily are the ranks being added to. The strain upon the nervous system is enormous, especially among women, whose "subjective" senses seem to be in greater proportion than those of the more animal man. The faddists have added to the ranks, and the idle woman of society has turned her attention to what at first amused, then interested, and finally baffled, and as a result we have to-day hundreds of men and women, and some children, who are playing with a force as insidious and as evil in its effects when not understood as any force yet discovered by experimental science. The "subjective" mind is paramount in the insane, and so on down the line until we reach the fully developed dual mentality, "subjective" and "objective" equally poised with reason in control, which some folk call genius.—Percy Lyndon Howard.

Waukesha Camp, Wis.

Dr. T. A. Bland, of Chicago, was called to Waukesha camp-meeting on the 7th inst., to fill a vacancy in the lecture program, and the management was so much pleased with his lecture on "The Religion of Demonstration vs. the Religion of Dogma," that they made a vacancy for him to give his lecture on the "Twin Superstitions." The Doctor remained as a guest of the camp over Sunday, the 10th, when he returned home full of enthusiasm. He says that it is one of the most delightful camp-meetings he ever attended. It is most beautifully situated only a mile from the city, and the management, at the head of which stands that grand woman and noble worker, Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, president of the Wisconsin State Society, ably assisted by Mrs. Catharine McFarlin, vice-president, and Will J. Erwood, pastor of the Spiritual Church at LaCrosse, secretary. These are all first-class public lecturers and most earnest and enthusiastic workers in the cause. And more than this, they are all so filled with love and good will that they radiate an influence throughout the camp which inspires all who visit it with a feeling of brotherhood and unites them as a loving family. The camp is new, this being its first year, and the attendance not yet large, but growing daily, and it will undoubtedly prove a success this year. There are a number of very fine mediums on the ground, representing many phases. Dr. Nellie C. Mosier astonishes and convinces the skeptics by her wonderfully accurate public tests. Mr. and Mrs. Buchanan, the noted mediums for slate and letter writing, gave a public seance on the evening of Sunday, the 10th, in the auditorium, during which thirty-five sheets of paper, put between slates at the same time, were filled on both sides with written messages, addressed to different persons in the audience, in exactly seven minutes, the slates being in full view the whole time of a large part of the audience. The Doctor says that he left the camp with regret, and he met persons there, who came to stay but a few days, who resolved to stay to the close of the season. X.

IN THE HIGHER REALMS.

The Ministry of Music for Health and Healing.

Since the beginning of time music has ever been the solace and inspiration of mankind. One of the earliest songs on record is the song of the Israelites after the passage of the Red Sea, when Miriam accompanied by the women sang: "Sing ye to the Lord for He hath triumphed gloriously."

While great advancement continues to be made in the world of music and a corresponding appreciation and taste for the best is being developed among music lovers, the ministry of music for health and healing has received scant recognition. Still the awakening interest in the subject is an encouraging sign. As the therapeutic value of music gains recognition we learn that it is plastic in the hands of the one who understands its power and how to employ it, and potent of great life-giving energy. Musicians who have spent years in the routine of professional work and have been awakened by the truths of higher metaphysics, have found it almost impossible to keep up their interest in their work from the old standpoint. There has come a deep and fundamental change. Their art for a time ceases to interest them. It is impossible to force it; better not. Rest the talent and turn the mind to other interests; with the awakening of the inner voice one needs to be still and listen. The unfoldment is slow with many, but there comes the awakening when the God from within speaks and vitalizes every gift to his service. The musician who has been looking without for inspiration and encouragement, has now found himself, and in finding has discovered that it is the Divine Spirit alone that inspires, renews and quickens and will direct his work.

Old ambitions, vanities, self-seeking drop away as an old garment, and he finds his desire is to sing unto the Lord a new song, one of love and praise, of health and healing, of peace and good will. For the musician who has passed through this experience, the field of musical healer is waiting. There are thousands of musicians to whom this department of their profession will not appeal, who would think they were burying their talent under a bushel. Not to astonish by technique nor awaken applause by brilliant execution, nor be the recipient of flowers and flattery, to merely devote their gift to the service of healing—what a waste of genius! Let these go their way. There is room for all. If they took up the work it would be a fad.

To be a successful musical healer, certain qualifications are necessary. An understanding of mental laws and their effect upon the body, ability to diagnose mental conditions, tact and judgment in the selection of key, rhythm, and kind of music best adapted to individual needs, when to employ it and when not to; for music is a cosmic force, dynamic to disturb as well as harmonize. If used without understanding, music can excite to frenzy the mentally unbalanced, the most susceptible class to its influence. All who enter this work should tune their souls to Divine Harmony, be dominated by the now. Keep the mind free from fear of the environment in which they may find themselves. Let their motto be, "From life, through life, to life." Select music that will expand the soul and send a thrill of renewed life through every fibre of the body and leave a pleasing mental picture.

The subject of key notes is attracting the attention of scientific investigation. We seek exact knowledge based upon the law of vibration and conclusions that cannot be denied. While we continue our investigations let us make practical what we already know. Select the key that is most pleasing to the patient, the one to which he is most responsive; play or sing in this key; change to others but return to it again. Chant, using words of affirmation of joy and love, and if your spirit is in tune with Divine Harmony, your voice true, your touch sympathetic, you will set up vibrations in the patient that will expand and free the congested lungs, quiet the abnormal heart action, relax the nerves and enable him to inhale the breath of life from the center of Being. Music will often relieve pain, quiet the mind, and induce sleep without the knowledge of the musician who has been instrumental in producing this change. But the musical healer will not be satisfied with these results, which may be temporary, but will, by understanding that it is the Divine Spirit that heals, open his soul, a willing instrument to be played upon by the Master Musician.

Music creates states of mind. The highest expression is love. If the musician can produce a mental condition where fear, resentment, and discord are replaced by an influx of Divine Love, the result will be harmony, as every atom of the physical organism will respond to the call.

I have seen musical treatment prove beneficial in such a variety of disorders that I hesitate to specify and say it is better for this or that disease.

One of the first patients upon whom I tested the influence of music had been a sufferer for five months with chills and fever when she came to me for mental treatment. She slowly improved. One Sunday afternoon she called saying she felt very ill. She was then in a state of high fever bordering on delirium. After making her comfortable on the sofa and remaining with her for a few minutes, I went into the adjoining room where there were several musicians, all interested in the case and in sympathy with the treatment. The first movement of "The Moonlight Sonata" was played, followed by the songs, "Evening Star," from Tannhauser, and "There is a land mine eye hath seen," by M. Crowinshield. After the last song I found the patient in a deep sleep, which lasted six hours, and free from fever. I did not see her again for a week. Then she was feeling perfectly well, though I was hardly prepared at that early stage of my practice of musical therapeutics to expect a complete cure. Such was the case, however, as she has never had a return of her trouble.

About the same time another patient under my care, and in my own home, was a gentleman. Almost a mental wreck from worry over financial losses, he slept little, and his dreams were so distressing that he feared for his sanity. This patient also professed a decided dislike to music. When we ventured to try it in connection with mental treatments, we found that certain kinds of simple, rhythmical melody produced soothing and beneficial results. After this we employed such music in the early evening, continuing it half an hour after he had fallen asleep. At the end of six weeks he was enjoying normal health.

Naturally there are cases where the musical treatment should not be employed. When the patient is extremely susceptible to its influence, as an overworked professional musician, whose nerves are worn to depletion in the practice of his chosen profession, complete rest from hearing it would be more beneficial.

While we are considering the individual needs we should not forget the great harmonizing influence music has upon the masses, those of our brothers and sisters whose lives are devoid of all harmony and beauty. Paderewski says: "Give the people music of the right sort and you drive away many of the great social problems now troubling the capitalists." And Canon Barnett, of London, in an article in "The International Journal of Ethics," tells how he is bringing music into the lives of the East End of London, and how receptive they are to the best. He says: "A church filled with hundreds of East Londoners, affected doubtless in different ways, but all silent, reverent and self-forgetful, is a sight not to be forgotten or to be held to have no meaning." He continues: "Music would seem fitted to be in this age the expression of that which men in their inmost hearts most reverence. Creeds have ceased to express this and have become symbols of division rather than of Unity! Music is a parable, telling in sounds which will not change of that which is worthy of worship, telling it to each hearer just in so far as he by nature and circumstance is able to understand it. By music men may be helped to find God, who is not far from any one of us, and be brought again within reach of that tangible sympathy—the sympathy of their fellow creatures." At the dawn of the twentieth century in view of the utilitarian and human uses to which the cosmic forces have been directed, we can hopefully look forward along the path of this new and almost untrodden field for the use of musical vibrations, to the time not far distant when music will be fully recognized and employed in the service of healing.—Eva A. Vescelius, in The Exodus, Chicago, Ill.

HEALERS.

They Are Called Upon to Organize.

Nearly all the professions are organized into state and national organizations. Why should not the Psycho Magnetic Healers and Psycho Medical Physicians have the advantage of state and national organizations,

Perhaps an organization that might include several of our Northwestern states would better serve the purpose of these practitioners. I use the term or appellation, Psycho Magnetic Healers, as distinguishing those who treat under spirit influence, and in whom the electric or magnetic force is generated and from them transmitted to their patient, from the large number who are to-day claiming to give magnetic treatments "not under spirit influence," and who depend entirely for the magnetic or electric force upon manipulation or friction over certain nerve centers or portions of the body.

The country is to-day flooded with advertisements of parties offering to teach this method of practice to all who will pay the required fee, and many are being misled as pupils into the idea that they are receiving instruction in the genuine art or practice of magnetic healing.

Parties, too, who have been treated by this class of so-called magnetic healers, suppose they have received the genuine magnetic treatment, and judge all by what they have experienced.

I by no means claim that there is no virtue in the treatments of this class of healers, but instead of being magnetic, it is simply an intelligent massage treatment, and should be so taught and regarded.

It is certainly time that the true magnetics, or more properly speaking, Psycho Magnetic Healers, should adopt some means to draw the line of distinction between these two modes of practice, so that the public may fully understand the same. The gift of healing is a natural gift and cannot be acquired simply by education, but is a matter of development as well as education in those to whom it is given.

Another reason for organization in Illinois is that the medical law exempts spiritual healers or those healing by spiritual means, from its provisions. It would, therefore, seem almost essential that by organization we should cut ourselves entirely aloof from those who depend upon physical and not spiritual means. An organization perhaps might very properly include the Psycho Medical or Clairvoyant physician.

The intention of this article is to open the way and give an opportunity to all who may be interested, either as healers, clairvoyants or Spiritualists, to be heard.

Let us no longer be laggard, but show a worthy interest in one of the grandest phases of spiritual work, the healing of the sick.

I will be pleased to hear from my brother healers in this or adjoining states.

BLISSFUL PROPHET.

Spiritualists Returning to the Churches.

To the Editor:—Who on earth is the "Blissful Prophet" now installed among the pages of the "Magazine of Mysteries?" Have you seen in its July number, the report of his pious sayings, and pious palaver, in his pious devotions, to his imaginary Divinity? Is he some pious son of "Mother Church," for it's only such in "Holy Orders" could simulate such pious piety. At any rate, whoever he may be, priest or parson, he is certainly a pious falsifier of the first water, and for this reason: Among his pious sayings he says, "Spiritualists, God bless them, are being dissatisfied with their religion, and are returning to the churches, in great numbers."

Now, Mr. Editor, this would be impossible, for the theological gulf between modern Christianity and Modern Spiritualism, is too great to make it passable or possible, for Spiritualists, in great numbers, to return to the churches. Did you ever know such? I never did. As well might the feathered songsters, on the wing, want to return to their shells, as for full-fledged Spiritualists to want to return to their churches.

There is too much religious difference among the churches, too much undivine, mythical and speculative sophistry, and fiction among the churches. In a word, there is too much theology, and too little religion, to suit Spiritualists, among the churches. But, Oh! Mr. Editor, such pious slopping over, as seen in the "Magazine of Mysteries," makes me tired.

I have written the above that your readers may know there are unscrupulous press writers in the East, who are either pious knaves, rankest hypocrites, or veriest damphools.

Spiritualism an Ethical Factor.

He has small faith in the ethical forces that work the onward trend of social and spiritual evolution, who cannot look forward to the time when, on this earth, the coming ethical man shall stand with head uplifted among the stars, a brother among all his kind, his face glowing with love of truth, right, equity, humanity.

While various factors, innate and the result of experience, observation and environments, tend to enlarge and intensify man's ethical perceptions and sentiments, and thus increase their power and influence in the formation of character and one's manner of life among and toward men, the ethical instinct develops by its own proper use, its culture by thought and experience; and in its turn, by natural result, lifts man to higer planes, clearer and more refined conceptions of its import, its binding, moral, obligatory nature as a law of government for humanity, that cannot be annuled or suspended at the behest of any lower instinct or desire.

It is perceived and felt as a law superior in authority to all claims of passion or greed, which would incite to acts of selfish gratification, even to the infliction of injustice and wrong upon individuals or society.

It is of course plainly to be seen that this pure law is violated every day, in the world of business, and in common life; it is violated in spirit and in numberless concrete ways in business, in social and industrial affairs.

These violations are facts which are known and recognized, if not openly acknowledged, even by those who are most guilty of such dereliction.

It is somewhat of a gain, a seed of promise of better things, when open, or even inner mental acknowledgment of wrong is made; it argues the upspringing and growth of ethical sentiment, tending toward higher and better life.

So, may we not say that the millionaire who has amassed his millions in ways that do not run parallel with the straight lines of purely ethical laws of conduct, evinces a sense of his guilt when he sets out in a round-about way to return to society, by benefactions to educational institutions, etc., some of the hoard he has withheld from his underpaid laborers, who were essential factors in the production of his wealth.

In these benefactions he is in some degree evening-up with society, by returning to it a part of the wealth which society has been the great factor in producing. Without society he could not have wealth. A man may gather piles of gold and silver, and have houses and land, but unless he has the social world around him, to give value to his possessions, his piles of gold are no more than the same bulk of sand.

To society, and to himself merely as an equitable factor in the social body, he owes all his wealth.

The Ethical Man, toward whom the finer spiritualizing forces of Evolution are tending, when he shall appear on the earth, will feel his indebtedness to society, and to his fellow-men individually, for the earthly goods he possesses, and his life will be swayed by ethical law, rather than grasping greed.

And to this end Spiritualism tends, by its uplifting, spiritualizing, ethical influence.

The Prophets and Their Prophecies.

The astrologers and other prophets having failed to kill King Edward, or to prevent his coronation, it is "up to them" to recast their horoscopes and explain the failure of their prophecies. King Edward has lived and received his coronation in spite of all the adverse influence of their prophecies, working in the thought of many minds, and, according to press reports, on the mind of the King himself.

Such prophecies tend to work out their own fulfillment, especially in the case of impressible minds, and therefore are to be deprecated; and for deaths or misfortune thus caused, such prophets are morally responsible.

This consideration, as well as the many ignominious failures of prophecies, should cause the prophetically inclined to pause when they feel within them the stirrings of the prophetic inflatus, lest they become, morally, murderers.

Many a good man, many a good woman, has been literally killed, murdered by such prophecies preying upon their minds. "Suggestion" and "auto-suggestion," are sufficient explanation of the evil results in such cases, without any need or proof of any degree of foreknowledge in the matter.

And in the case of death so caused, the prophet of evil should be looked upon as virtually, morally, a murderer.

Hudson Tuttle's reply in The Progressive Thinker as to Swedenborg's work on the Bible (in Questions and Answers) is perfect. A Model Savior—That Is What Each One Should Be.

Often there is a model man in the industrial walks of life, who may be designated as a Savior in the broadest and most comprehensive sense of that word. James Wilson once upon a time referred to just such a distinguished character in the Cedar Rapids (Iowa) Gazette. This Savior was a man who had a peculiar place in the liking of many a neighbor. He was known in the family to which he belonged as "Our Jack." Nobody gave him "John." It would have seemed like putting up a fence between him and his friends to have used such ceremony as giving him either his full name or his right name. Jack was known far and near. A royal fellow he was. His like in many ways was not easily come across. It seemed as if away back in some of the family strains from which he was descended his antetype had existed, and nature, through some freak, reproduced Jack with old-fashioned peculiarities that were noticeable because they differed so much from most folks. Jack was fully thirty before he became of age. He was a great, big, open-handed, open-hearted, generous soul, helping this one to a good turn and more hope, keeping the laugh going and provoking the mirth by droll remarks and apt illustrations. It elevates to lend a helping hand. The Iowa farmer is generally a thrifty man. Jack delighted far more in helping somebody than in looking out for himself. It seemed as if there was need of a neighborhood factor, free from selfishness, defiant of care, a receptacle of general complaint, and a physician for imaginary ills. Jack filled the bill. A neighbor brightened up a mile off if he saw him coming, and after he parted from Jack he felt lighthearted for a whole day. After coming to the last year of his teens he noticed that Abraham Lincoln seemed in most need of help, and as much to keep old Abe easy in mind and hopeful as anything else Jack joined the First Iowa Cavalry with other farmer boys. He returned with broken health, but with all his humor in full life. The neighbors thought Jack would turn his attention now to money-making, as all with whom he associated were of that turn of mind, but his flow of humor, his liking to do others good turns—and of others to have him—absorbed him until he met Mary and took her to church and they were man and wife. Then he turned to property-getting, and was getting it fast, but, alas, his army life followed him. Calls had been made on the boy that the man had to pay, and he paid the full demands with his life. Mary and her two boys missed Jack wofully. We all missed him. There were sore hearts for Jack.

Jack was a Savior in view of the fact that he invariably made it a custom to assist others; to encourage those in trouble; to be a benediction and a blessing in the community where he lived. If all were like him there would be no sin and suffering in the world, and the millennium would commence at once, and that, too, without any sectarian religion behind it.

Dean Farrar has said that "the true conception of duty is co-extensive with the entire range of human life. It was never intended that man should be absorbed in isolated aims, nor that his thoughts should be exclusively devoted to the concerns of his personal interest. He who is content with such selfishness spends his life like a beast with lower pleasures, like a beast with lower pains.' He hardly rises to the true dignity of a man at all.

"It is clear, therefore, that the main effort of our human life should be to follow the highest of all examples, and not primarily to seek our own pleasure and advantage, but to gain our true life by the willing, and even glad, sacrifice of all transient personal aims, and the predominant effort, at all costs, to improve the conditions of things around us, and to leave the world, so far as lies in our power a little better and a little happier than we found it. This is what we mean by the corporate life in general. Our duties and, therefore, our highest interests, widen outward like the ripple on the surface of a lake; they only cease when the tiny wave of our earthly life breaks upon the shore of Eternity. Our highest duty to ourselves is our most sacred duty to others. It begins with the duties which we owe to those who are nearest and dearest to us in the circle of our domestic life. It widens at once to the whole circle of our neighbors. From them it spreads to the societies around us in the villages or cities in which our lot may be cast. From them it extends to the whole nation to which we belong. Finally, it involves our relations to the whole family of man. It will be seen, then, at once that the highest and most concentrated rule of the religious life is the basis of all true morality, namely: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

"The first opponents of the slave trade were ridiculed and persecuted, as hopeless fanatics and disagreeable faddists, and the supporters of the trade which stole human beings from their homes and subjected them to horrible barbarities had so entirely drugged and sophisticated their own consciences as to declare with Boswell that to suppress the trade would be to hinder the progress of the Christian religion, and to shut the gates of mercy on mankind. The opposition to the slave trade did not come from a somnolent church, smitten with the apoplexy of immoral custom and the shameless sophisms of greedy self-interest, but from the clearer insight and deeper sincerity of previously unknown laymen, who, at the cost of their own peace—and amid the abuse and hatred of conventional religionists, whose god was practically their belly—succeeded in at last arousing the national conscience to recognize the guilt of the hideous crime in which the nation was so completely engaged.

"The deliverance of nations from crime and from the ultimate ruin which crime, sooner or later, involves, has always been due to religion in the heart of the citizen; but generally—indeed without exception—the salvation has arisen from the heroic efforts of one or two men who have been the first to see truth in its own light, and not through the distorting medium of custom and self-interest. These men are often comparatively unknown, and only derive their influence from the strength of their convictions. It was thus that Clarkson stood for a time all but alone against the indifference and wrong-doing of his country, and with the subsequent aid of Wilberforce, Zachary, Macaulay, and Granville Sharpe saved England from 'the crime of using the arm of freedom to bind the fetters of the slave.' Similarly one man—John Howard—purified the foul prisons of England and of Europe, the condition of which were so cruel and infamous as to constitute a disgrace to humanity.

"So, too, one man, Lord Shaftsbury, rescued thousands of miserable factory children from shameless oppression. God calls forth his prophets, and not seldom from the ranks of humble and unknown laymen."

You can readily see that it is a duty to become a Savior. Anyone who does an unselfish act, performs a disagreeable duty, cheers a saddened heart, assists the unfortunate, encourages the despondent and renders substantial aid to those in distress becomes a true Savior—perhaps equally as good, equally as benign, and as near to any God and the angels as his elder brother, the Nazarene. It does not need religion to become a broad-minded Savior—one who is a blessing to those with whom he comes in contact. It is the duty of everyone to try and become a first-class Savior to some one less fortunate. Try it, reader, and see how grandly it will make you feel.

Continuous Vaudeville in Church.

According to the New York Post, the prediction lately made by a minister in one of the western cities—Chicago—to the effect that the only way in which it would soon be possible to maintain an interest in church work would be by means of "continuous vaudeville," startled a great many conservative church-goers, and possibly shocked some of them. However, the stream of tendency seems to have set rather strongly in the direction of a fulfillment of this prophecy. Billiards, ping-pong, hops, amateur theatricals, secular concerts, legerdemain, charades, sociables, fairs, suppers primarily for purposes of revenue, music of doubtful sacredness—if there is a dividing line between the sacred and secular in music; all of these have come to be recognized as adjuncts of more or less value in church work. The underlying idea seems to be to make the church an attractive social club, and thus bring within its sphere of influence many who value a church connection at the outset chiefly for the social opportunities it offers. It would be difficult to find a serious objection to this view of so much of the work of a church as may properly be considered secular. There may be a line which it would be dangerous to cross, but where it lies would probably be as difficult to define as is the Alaska boundary.

Perhaps the same is true of "stunts" or "turns" introduced to give the interest of variety to Sabbath devotions. For example, engaging an attractive "young woman in a pure white dress nineteen years old" to whistle solos, as is said to have been done by the pastor, or music committee, or both acting in the harmonious conjunction which should characterize all church doings, of one of our New York churches, startles the old-fashioned church-goer by its novelty. In the last analysis, however, there would seem to be no essential difference between breath from sound lungs oozing through pretty puckered lips and wind from a bellows of wood and leather hissing through the reeds of a pipe organ in the bank controlled by the piccolo stop. We are used to the cornet, as our forefathers were to the bass viol. We have listened with equanimity to operatic prima donne rendering selections which have inspired very lofty emotions when for the erotic wallings of the Italian libretto were substituted modern hymns with some pretensions to poetic excellence. We have learned to march up the aisle and undulate sidewise into our pews to the solemn minor cadences of one of Thielmann's or Jadassohn's preludes, and waltz out again when, as the blast sentries on the subway say, it's "All over," to the "Soldiers' March" in "Faust," played with rag-time variations, or choice selections from "El Capitan" or one of the Offenbach classics. No doubt when whistling girls dressed as above described, rendering "Traumerei" or "The Mocking Bird," are the usual thing, we shall take them as a matter of course and wonder why any one should be so narrow in his or her conventional prejudices as to question their eminent fitness as adjuncts to devotion. True, girls will have to learn to whistle a good deal better than any we have heard try are able to do, to be entirely agreeable as entertainers, but that is beside the point. We have heard alleged singers of whom the kindest thing which could be said was that they had mistaken their vocation, but, in the expressive vernacular of the day, singing "goes" in church, even when feeble and uncertain as to intervals. For the same reason whistling may go when we are used to it. It is, after all, only another step toward what has been pronounced inevitable—worship by means of the continuous vaudeville.

MIND-BUILDING TO ORDER.

How to Improve in Spirituality.

ELMER GATES HAS A SYSTEM OF MAKING BAD FOLKS GOOD—IT SOLVES THE MYSTERY OF INSPIRATION, AND SHOWS THAT GENIUS IS NO MORE ERRATIC THAN THE MULTIPLICATION TABLE—HIS EXPERIMENTS IN PSYCHOLOGY.

After studying for more than a quarter of a century Elmer Gates, of Washington, thinks that he has learned just how the mind invents and discovers. Early in life, becoming interested in the workings of his own mind, Mr. Gates began a systematic series of observations and studies, which, he now asserts, have led him to the discovery of a new domain in experimental psychology, an evolution of mind building and development which he has named the Mentative Art.

From the beginning of his investigations, Mr. Gates applied his discoveries to his own mind. He says that in this way he gained a superior method, not only of investigating mental processes, but of making them fruitful in the line of invention and discovery. More than this, he says he has solved the mystery of inspiration and is able, by means of the Mentative Art, to show just how Pegasus makes his flights. He believes he has found that the laws which control these mental processes are as regular in their operation as the law of gravity, and that, when they are understood and obeyed, it will be found that the work of genius is no more erratic than is the multiplication table.

In discussing mind building and development, which Mr. Gates contends is true education, he says he has proved, by a series of experiments, that the cell is not only the anatomic, but also the psychological unit of animals and plants, and that cells can, by psychological training, be developed into new species; also that he finds that conscious mental experience creates, in some part of the brain, new structural onregistration, which is the embodied memory of that experience.

One of the experiments by which he arrived at this conclusion was with young dogs of the same age. One of these Mr. Gates reared as nearly as possible in perfect darkness and the other in constant light. When they were grown he killed them and after a careful examination of the brains of each showed that the part which controls sight in the brain of the dog reared in light had more cells and they were larger and fully twenty-five times better developed than was the same part of the brain of the one reared in darkness. Another experiment, also with young dogs, which Mr. Gates taught to discriminate color, showed like results. A part of the brain of those that had been trained was not only better developed, but contained more cells than those of the same age and kind which had not been trained.

That the cells of the brain can be not only enlarged, made more efficient and increased in number, but that these changes are transmitted to offspring, Mr. Gates says he proved by a series of experiments on guinea pigs. Also that new mental characteristics and qualities can be acquired by brain enregistration, produced by mind activity, and that these are transmitted.

These experiments led Mr. Gates to consider a cure for immorality and criminal propensities, based on scientific facts. Holding that the structure of the brain can be changed by training, he says that if, in that portion of the mind where evil memories are engendered, those that are good are upbuilt by being kept active each day, they will replace those that are bad. In this way an evil disposition may be converted into one that is good.

For example, an ill-tempered child has an overdevelopment of certain brain structure. Each time it is angry the blood flows to that part of the brain. In this way it becomes more and more developed and the evil tendency increases. The remedy for this and similar undesirable tendencies is to train the child in other kinds of emotions, thus enregistering in other parts of the brain better memory structures, while leaving those which are undesirable inactive and unnourished. Mr. Gates believes that in the future this law will be recognized and that reform schools will be replaced by training in accordance with them.

As the child may be trained, so, Mr. Gates says, each individual may train himself. That, as the organ of thought is perpetually changing in cell structure and is never finished, each normal human being is the architect of his own brain, and may rebuild and alter whenever he sees fit. He says:

"Let a person devote an hour a day to calling up a certain class of fine, uplifting emotions and memories, which in ordinary life are summoned only occasionally; let him do this regularly as he would take physical exercise, and at the end of a month he will be able to note a surprising change. This change will be apparent in all his thoughts, desires and actions."

Habits are formed, Mr. Gates says, in this way. When a thing is done many times in the same manner that part of the brain structure which does the thinking in connection with the act is nourished by the increased flow of blood which the activity causes, consequently the same impulses continue to be engendered with increasing strength.

It has long been recognized that cheerfulness is conducive to health. Mr. Gates says that he has found by experiment and observation that there is an important provable relation between the emotions and the chemical changes constituting cellular nutrition and that he has found that cheerful, hopeful emotions increase nutrition, while sadness and anxiety produce destructive changes.

When Mr. Gates had his mental processes well in hand, in accordance with the laws he had discovered, he began to demonstrate what he could do with his mind, which he had trained in accordance with these laws.

At Chevy Chase, Washington's beautiful Maryland suburb, Mr. Gates is applying this crucial test. Beyond a wild olive hedge and a pretty villa in the midst of wide grounds, on the line of the electric road, just beyond Chevy Chase Circle, is a long commodious building, shaded by trees and flowering vines. This is Mr. Gates' workshop. Here are the inventions in practical form which Mr. Gates asserts are the result of applying the Mentative Art to his own mind. Here also are skilled workmen engaged in making different parts of recent inventions.

Among the inventions to be seen in his laboratory is an electric shuttle, which he believes is destined to make weaving of fabrics a much easier process than at present. Others of equal importance are machines for separating one substance from another when not in chemical combination. One of these, an electrostatic float and flour gold separator, takes the finest particles of gold from a stream of falling sand as a magnet attracts iron filings. When the machine is in motion the particles of gold may be seen flying through the air eight inches and more to the separator, to which they cling. This machine is pronounced a great invention by Major J. W. Powell, founder and director of the Bureau of American Ethnology, in the Smithsonian Institution, Prof. A. H. Thompson of the United States Geological Survey, William Essic, superintendent of the Comstock mines, and other capable judges who have examined it.

Mr. Gates affirms that, by a method of psycho-physical measurements, he can not only diagnose disease but can detect its approach long before the patient feels the first symptoms and before any other method of diagnosis could discover it. He also asserts that he has successfully applied his system of brain-building to the cure of disease.

As to his peculiar system of mind training, he says that while scientists and others have been occupied with the effect of the brain on the body, he has given his attention to the effect of the body and its environments on the brain. He holds that first of all the body should be well nourished, oxygenized and rested, in order that the brain may be thoroughly sustained. Darkness, he holds, was made for rest and daylight for work, so each day in the year he works from dawn till dark. Rising with the sun, he retires at dusk. He burns no midnight oil. He says:

"Eating, sleeping, resting, thinking, should be punctiliously regular. Select a list of subjects in any one domain and consider them at a certain time each day. At first the images will be slow, and indistinct and inaccurate, and the mind will quickly tire in considering them. But by repeating the process daily at the same time the law of psychological periodicity is utilized, and, if the body is in a condition to nourish the brain, the images will soon become vivid and rapid and there will be scarcely any conscious effort. This utilizing the law of psychological periodicity is of the greatest importance in training the mental functions to promote efficiency and endurance. In fact, it is a law of success, and is constantly utilized by those who succeed in any line of effort, as any one may see who will give the matter a little thought."

Mr. Gates says he has found that in the early morning the sensory and muscular structures should be employed. During the late morning hours the intellect should take the lead. In the afternoon and evening the emotive and affective functions should dominate, and the more completely one set of faculties rest the more efficient will they be when operative.

That his system will make commonplace minds great he by no means asserts. He says that there is as much difference in minds as in trees, but that every sort of mind can be improved by his method. The inventive mind will be taught just how to discover without waste of time or energy, and the Mentative Art will enable each individual to control and utilize his mind to the best advantage.

Prominent educators and scientists are deeply interested in this new work. Prof. McGee, of the Smithsonian Institution, in speaking of it said recently: "I think this line of work will revolutionize education and lead to more intellectual progress in the next quarter century than in all the centuries before."

Arrangements are now being made to organize and equip a department of an Institute of Psychology and Psychurgy, which Mr. Gates proposes to establish. In this department he will verify, classify and teach one of the sciences which will typify and demonstrate his system.

The above from the New York Sun illustrates a grand truth. Elmer Gates is a remarkable man and his discoveries in the domain of Science has placed him in the front rank of the thinkers of the present age. As said by Luther Gulick, M. D., "wholesome thinking is necessary. A man who is constantly thinking about things that are the matter with him creates the evil he fears. It is a well-known fact that constant direction of the thoughts to any part of the body will alter the circulation of blood in that part. A man who is all the time thinking about his liver will, other things being equal, have more trouble than a man who does not. The thinking world is just as real a part of us as the world of matter, and the man can no more be healthy and all the time be thinking unhealthy thoughts than he can be strong and vigorous permanently and be living a life of direct violation of physical laws."

To become spiritual one must think pure thoughts, and from within his mind high and noble ideals. One becomes in time like the ideals which he evolves within his inner consciousness. The lesson given by Elmer Gates is an important one. The hints he gives are invaluable to every reflective mind. Spiritualists should ponder them well. Cultivate spirituality, cheerfulness, kindness, charity, love for all, honesty; this can be done by right thinking.

We are glad to learn that the Doctor has so far recovered from the painful surgical operation through which she passed some time ago, that she has been able to go to her farm in Michigan, where it is expected her restoration to perfect health will soon follow.

CONSOLATION.

Sitting in the gathering twilight,
On a dreary winter's eve,
Thoughts of loved ones, long departed,
Come, my heart to deeply grieve.

Through my half-shut lids I see them,
Visions of a happier day
When the chain was yet unbroken,
And no loved one passed away.

When I had no dread of sorrow,
And my life seemed so complete,
With my loved ones all around us
And the days were passing sweet.

And to-night I feel her presence
All about me in the room—
I can see her form and features
And it brightens up my gloom.

Through the door I see her tripping
In her dainty baby fun:
She whose race on earth was ended
With her life-work scarce begun.

Scarce begun—and yet it may be
That her work was finished here;
That her mission was to lead us
To a better, purer sphere.

And her presence was but lent us
By our Heavenly Father's love,
To draw our hearts from earthly things
To mansions built above.

And my heart has lost its burden,
Since I saw her face to-night,
For I know that somehow, somewhere,
We will meet in realms of light.

I will meet with all the loved ones
Who have passed beyond the tide,
And her baby hands will lead me
Safely to the other side.

"Right Generation the Key to the Kingdom of Heaven on Earth." By Dr. M. E. Conger. An appeal to reason and man's highest aspirations. A plea for justice and equality in all the relations of life between men and women. Cloth, 75 cents; leatherette, 50 cents.

On the Threshold.

Standing on the threshold, with her wakening heart and mind,
Standing on the threshold, with her childhood left behind,
The woman softness blending with the look of sweet surprise
For life and all its marvels that lights the clear blue eyes.

Standing on the threshold, with light foot and fearless hand,
As the young knight in his armor in a minster nave might stand;
The fresh red lip just touching youth's ruddy, rapturous wine,
The eager heart all brave, pure hope, oh happy child of mine!

I could guard the helpless infant that nestled in my arms;
I could save the prattler's golden head from petty baby harms;
I could brighten childhood's gladness, and comfort childhood's tears,
But I cannot cross the threshold with the step of riper years.

For hopes, and joys, and maiden dreams are waiting for her there,
Where girlhood's fancies bud and bloom as April's golden air;
And passionate love, and passionate grief, and passionate gladness lie
Among the crimson flowers that spring as youth goes fluttering by.

Ah! on those rosy pathways is no place for sobered feet,
My tired eyes have naught of strength such fervid glow to meet;
My voice is all too sad to sound amid the joyous notes
Of the music that through charmed air for opening girlhood floats.

Yet thorns amid the leaves may lurk, and thunder-clouds may lower,
And death, or change, or falsehood blight the jasmine in thy bower;
May God avert the woe, my child; but oh! should tempest come,
Remember, by the threshold waits the patient love of home.

HON. LUTHER MARSH,

The Venerable Jurist, Has Passed to Spirit Life.

According to dispatches from New York, Luther R. Marsh, the venerable jurist and famous Spiritualist, breathed his last at 5:15 p. m. August 15, at his home in Middletown, N. Y. Mr Marsh had been in feeble health for the last month, and for the last three weeks had taken no solid food. His death was due to stomach trouble and general debility. Half an hour before the end came Mr. Marsh lapsed into unconsciousness, breathing shorter and shorter until the heart ceased its action.

Mr. Marsh's last public appearance on the platform was nearly two months ago, when he delivered an address in Beth-Jacob Synagogue, Newburg, at the request of Rabbi Elkins. Mr. Marsh's last illness was hastened by his attempting to do too much work of late.

Some days ago Mr. Marsh summoned Justice Bartlett of the Court of Appeals to his bedside and it is believed made final disposition of his great library and picture gallery.

ENDS REMARKABLE CAREER.

The death of Mr. Marsh ends the earthly career of one who was in his day a distinguished member of the New York bar. He was among the first in his profession. So great was his fame that Daniel Webster became his law partner after leaving Tyler's cabinet, and one of Mr. Marsh's most cherished possessions was the old-fashioned office sign—a bit of black tin, bearing Mr. Webster's name in gilt.

By his own genius Mr. Marsh rose from the practice of a country attorney to counsellor in great cases involving millions and becoming precedents in American jurisprudence. He was born in 1813 in Pompey, N. Y., of good Puritan stock, his ancestors being among the first settlers of Massachusetts. Mr. Marsh early won distinction for his skill and eloquence in difficult cases. His mastery of technicalities attracted the attention of the officers of the Erie Railway, and he became its counsel.

He came to New York in 1841, and was soon recognized as a man of power. His oration at the opening of the world's fair in the new Crystal Palace, gave him national reputation. He held his high position as a leader of the New York bar for fifty-two years. He was ardently devoted to building up the city. Among his reforms was the abolition of burying the dead in the city.

He drew the act of 1883 for enlarging the New York public park system to 3,840 acres. He was president of the park commission created by a special act of legislature, appraising property to the value of $10,000,000. He was naturally proud of his work, especially in obtaining what was then considered vast tracts of land for the city without expense. He bought so much property that the surplus advancing in price paid for the entire purchase. Thus the city had its park domain free of cost.

In view of Mr. Marsh's extraordinary accomplishments it is beyond explanation how he became a victim of the notorious Diss De Bar, a vile woman, who not only made him believe, but was presently in possession of his valuable brown stone residence in Madison avenue. It was the turning point of his life, however, when he found his friends uncompromisingly against him in his unreasoning acceptance of Diss De Bar's fake spirit manifestations. It was afterward confessed that the Diss De Bar's pictures were as fraudulent as the seances that produced them.

Finding himself ostracised, so to speak, on account of his associations with the woman Diss De Bar, Mr. Marsh received an invitation from Mrs. Huyler, a most estimable lady, and a genuine medium, the wife of John Huyler of Middle town, N. Y., to visit them and investigate her claims of communication with the dead. That was twelve years ago. Mr. Marsh, discouraged and lonely, accepted and remained there until his death.

FAITH IN THE SEANCES.

Under the Huyler roof seances were held from week to week, believers coming from all parts of the Union, and Mr. Marsh declared that all the communications were absolutely genuine, and masterpieces of literature. Among them were messages from Adelaide Neilson. His regard for her amounted to a passion.

Mr. Marsh differed from the majority of Spiritualists regarding orthodox religion. He was a firm believer in the scriptures, especially in the New Testament, and in defense of the divine plan of redemption he was an earnest advocate.

The Heroine Selects the Title.

On being congratulated recently upon the beautiful and appropriate title to his book, "In the World Celestial," Dr. Bland told a party of friends how he got it. He said he wrote some half-dozen titles which he submitted to literary friends for their opinion. Some thought one, and some another the best. About this time he visited the Spiritualist camp-meeting at Chesterfield, Indiana, and meeting Edgar W. Emerson, he handed the folded slips of paper on which the various titles were written, to him, simply saying, "Take these slips of paper in your hand and tell me what you get." He held them a few seconds, when he said: "A bright spirit woman stands by your side who gives me the name of Pearl. Now she selects one of these papers from the others, and holding it toward you, says: 'Use that.'"

On unfolding that paper the Doctor found it to be the one which contained the words, "In the World Celestial."

A few minutes later he met George P. Colby, to whom he handed the same slips of paper, asking him to tell what impression, if any, he could get. He placed his hand containing the folded slips upon his forehead a moment, and then selecting one from the lot, said: "A spirit who gives the name of Pearl, says that is the title of our book." It was the title selected by her through Emerson, and the Doctor at once adopted it. It is proper to say that neither Emerson nor Colby had any hint of what the slips of paper contained.

OUR PREMIUM BOOK.

The Religion of Man and Ethics of Science.

To the Editor.—Permit me to say that I have just finished reading the above work, which you have now offered as a premium for subscription. Like all of Hudson Tuttle's works and writings, this one is practical, sensible, thorough, scientific, philosophic and just. Every Spiritualist who wishes to be correctly informed upon questions affecting the welfare of man and society should read it; yet it is not by any means, a book peculiarly adapted to the Spiritualist. No one can read it without becoming larger, stronger, more hopeful and better equipped in every way to meet the issues and fulfill the duties that sooner or later must confront him as a reasonable being.

Spiritualism a Science, Not a Religion.

H. Junior Browne, a Prominent Medium, of Melbourne, Australia, Expresses His Views.

Science is described in the dictionary as a knowledge systematized, and Religion as the recognition of God as an object of worship. Science is from the brain, religion from the heart and its outcome is righteous action. Phenomena appertain to science, and as Spiritualism has its phenomena, it is therefore a science. Spiritualism is the foundation of all religion, for without its phenomena we possess no scientific basis for a belief in a spiritual world, and in a future state for mankind. It is on the evidence which its manifestations afford, that all forms of religion have been founded and formulated. The foundation, however, is very different to the superstructures raised thereon, just as the foundation of a house is not the building itself, though it is a very important part thereof. It is true that Spiritualism has a religious phase, since it is the science of life here and hereafter. It is the higher branch of science, a science open to the investigation of all, in which each investigator has to draw his own conclusions from the phenomena witnessed by him, just as the investigator of one of the physical sciences forms his own deductions from the facts presented to his senses. Without the evidence which spiritual phenomena afford religion is but a pious fraud, and we may eat and drink, for to-morrow we die, since without such evidence, belief in a life to come is purely conjectural and superstitious; with such evidence faith becomes eclipsed by knowledge based on facts, which are the foundations of all science and religion. Spiritualism comprises the knowledge of everything pertaining to the spiritual nature of man. It rests upon well-proven, world-wide facts, which can and have been classed scientifically.

As physical science deals with what are termed material phenomena, so psychic science or Spiritualism deals with spiritual phenomena. Through the facts deducted by physical science philosophers have proceeded to speculate in regard to the cosmos, the origin and destiny of man. From the facts demonstrated by the phenomena of Spiritualism, the higher philosophy is deduced—that is predicated in the knowledge of what the cosmos is, from whence man came, and what his future destiny will be.

I will not stop to argue concerning the occurrence of psychic phenomena, as their occurrence has been testified to in all ages and in all countries, and they are also in our time publicly attested, if not daily, at least monthly, in the numerous spiritualistic journals published in every civilized country of our globe, not by ignorant and superstitious people, but by many of those holding the highest literary and responsible appointments in the various countries to which they belong. The occurrence and reality of spiritual phenomena are therefore no longer mere matters of speculation or argument, but are matters of unquestionable fact, which no amount of denial or ridicule on the part of those opposed thereto can gainsay. One has a perfect right to believe in a future life without evidence of the truth thereof, but his belief therein does not prove that it is true; the man, however, who has had positive and unquestionable evidence that his friends who have passed through the change called "death," still live, does not require to merely believe, for he knows that as they live, so shall he live also after physical dissolution. The Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, I frankly admit, are full of accounts of spiritual manifestations from Genesis to Revelations; these accounts, however, are not evidence, they are merely testimony, and from their having been written in ignorant and superstitious times, they have been so exaggerated and falsified that there is little reliance to be placed upon many of them. Unfortunately some of those who, through the investigation of modern Spiritualism, know the grand truth of God's infinite wisdom, goodness and mercy, and of the glorious future that awaits every human soul eventually, still endeavor to run with the hare and the hounds, by holding that the exaggerated and fabulous accounts of spirit phenomena in the Bible are equally worthy of credibility with those of the present day of inductive reasoning, when we have made steam our galley slave, the sun our portrait painter, and electricity our postman and lamplighter. Falsehood and truth, however, like oil and water, will never blend. It is true that a great deal of trickery and imposture have been mixed up with modern Spiritualism, but this only proves that there have been genuine phenomena to copy from, and this does not do away with the fact that through modern spirit communion a higher and nobler conception of God, and more rational views of the future life have been conveyed to the world, which have, in a great degree, not only influenced modern literature but also the pulpit utterances of our day. The impious doctrine of eternal torment for the great majority of the race, for instance, is seldom or ever now preached from the pulpit as it used to be in my younger days. A glorious avenue of information, through spirit communion, has been opened to the world, notwithstanding the ridicule and contumely that have been heaped upon the investigators of Spiritualism by those who are as ignorant of it and the glorious truths which it unfolds, as are savages of differential calculus or of electricity.

Had the views of all spirits communicating with inquirers on earth regarding religion been unanimous there might be some cause for Spiritualism being viewed as a religion; as it is, it is the height of absurdity to call it a religion. If one who was a Roman Catholic when upon earth, and has not yet utilized his divine faculty of reason in regard to religion, is asked to give his views on religion, he will declare that Roman Catholicism is the only true religion; that the Pope is the vicegerent of God on earth, and that he holds the keys of heaven and hell; that none can enter heaven unless he be a Roman Catholic; and that the Romish priests have the power to forgive sins, and thereby over-ride the just and equitable law of retributive justice in the world of spirits. Let me here ask the following question: If devout Roman Catholics and priests go to heaven when they die, as they are supposed to do by Roman Catholics, where is the necessity of holding masses for the repose of their souls, as is practiced by the Romish Church, and what a swindle it is for that church to charge for such senseless performances? Then if a spirit who was a devout Protestant when on earth, and has not in spirit life utilized his reason in regard to religion, is asked to state his views thereon, he will declare that the religion taught by the sect to which he belonged is the true religion; that there is only one name by which we can be saved, namely, "Jesus Christ," as by his sufferings and death an atonement was made for the sins of all who believe in him, who was so humble when he was upon earth that it is reported that he reproved a young man for calling him even "good master," saying that there was none good but God; that Jesus, the son of a Jewish maiden, is the fulness of the Godhead bodily, the "Word" by whom all things were made that were made. If such a spirit is asked if he met Jesus since he entered the spirit world, and how he accounts for his earthly expectations not having been realized, he will say that we misunderstand the Bible, and that not until the great day of judgment and the trumpet shall sound will Jesus appear. Then, if a spirit who was a Mohammedan when upon earth, and has not, through the exercise of his reason, seen the folly of the religious views he held, is asked about religion, he will declare that Mohammedanism is the only true religion; that Mohammed was God's prophet through whom, the Mohammedan's Bible, the Koran, was written, etc.

Were Spiritualism a religion, as some assume it is, it would be a conglomeration of the most diverse and contradictory theories imaginable. When I first began to investigate Spiritualism, like many others, I viewed it as being a religion, but when I became aware that the change called "death" was merely a transformation from the mundane to the spiritual domain of nature, that thereby only the conditions of existence are changed in spirit life to those of earth life, and that the individuality and the religious views entertained are in no way affected by the change, I had to give up such an erroneous view for one more consistent with the facts patent to my senses. Anyone who maintains that Spiritualism is a religion must have a very superficial knowledge of the subject, or a mind that is incapable of grasping the palpable evidence afforded by its phenomena, that it is a science, having doubtless a religious phase. Spiritualism, or psychic science has been well termed the science of the soul, and the science of sciences. It is a complete induction, for it harmonizes with every fact in nature, and it therefore appeals to our reason.

I shall now show the difference between natural religion, of which there is only one, and artificial religion, of which there are many forms, consisting chiefly of superstition and pious credulity in inexplicable creeds and time-honored falsities. True religion, I maintain, is a natural instinct of the human mind which, when followed, prompts to righteous action, while artificial religion is foreign to the human mind, and requires to be instilled into it, or propagated by means of irrational creeds, priestly dogmas, and pagan ceremonials, with which natural religion has no connection whatever. True, or natural religion, being too simple for priestcraft to thrive on, it has been ignored, and artificial religion, which in its various forms is simply superstition, has, by an interested class of self-constituted teachers, styled priests, been substituted, by trading on the pious credulity and fears of the masses. The consequence of this is that after many centuries of teaching, it has failed to make its advocates, as a rule, even honest, far less righteous. It is true that the world during that time has made considerable progress, but this has arisen through the advance of human intelligence in spite of these priestly superstitions, and not as a result therefrom. Natural religion being rational, instead of its denouncing the use of reason in religious matters, as does artificial religion, it courts inquiry and criticism, it holds every doubt to be a prayer to God for more light, and doubt to be the lever by which the world has been raised from savagery to civilization; whereas artificial religion denounces doubt in religious matters as wicked, and calls reason, which is God's grandest gift to man, carnal reason, while it is an attribute of man's higher or spiritual nature, and not of his animal or lower nature, as the clergy maintain for their own ends. Let me here ask, Was it not through doubt that the old erroneous theory, once taught by the church, namely, that the sun revolved round the earth, was given up, and is it not from doubt that a hell of roasting in fire and brimstone has been abandoned by the churches as unreasonable, consequently is never now referred to in the various pulpits? It must be evident to every rational being that any theories, creeds or dogmas which cannot stand inquiry or rational analysis cannot be true or worthy of acceptance, except by those whose judgments have been warped before they were capable of reasoning by their having been taught what to think, not how to think. Natural religion existed before churches, priests and bibles were thought of, and it will continue to exist when these will be viewed as relics of barbaric superstition.

Artificial religions consist of creeds, forms and ceremonies, to which are added some of the precepts of natural religion in order to give them the semblance of authority, just as chemists coat their nasty pills with sugar in order to disguise their unpalatableness. It is these added moral and charitable precepts that have caused the various superstitions or artificial religions to last as long as they have done. Artificial religions look backward and delight in the darkness of the past, refusing to acknowledge the world's progress through the irresistible advance of human knowledge, though stealthily and reluctantly adapting themselves to the altered state of things to that in which they were formulated out of older and equally discordant religious systems. Natural religion, on the other hand, looks forward, and is ever advancing and gaining strength from every fresh conquest of science; it is based on the light of the present and on evidences of future brightness. This, which is the religion of good works or righteous action, embraces all that is true, good and soul-elevating in every so-called religious system; it consists of obedience to conscience duly enlightened by study and investigation, and the doing of right at all times, not for the purpose of securing selfish pleasures here or hereafter, but from a sense of duty and out of love for our fellow beings, producing a virtuous and well-spent life and an enthusiastic morality, which are the best sacrifices we can offer to God, and the surest indications of true spirituality. Natural religion appeals not only to the reason but also to the hearts of all humanity; it is of universal application, it tends towards the brotherhood of the race and the happiness of all, and it represents God in the most adorable aspects, and as infinitely superior to man's highest ideality and his loftiest conceptions of love, wisdom, goodness and mercy. Such is this divine religion—the higher law of truth and right—taught by those in spirit life, who, utilizing their divine faculty of reason, have cast aside as false and God dishonoring the irrational and superstitious creeds they were taught when upon earth as divine verities.

In order to prove the inconsistency and contradictory character of the various so-called religious systems still popular, take the following examples. The Roman Catholic Church claims that it alone is the true and infallible church. The Greek Church denies this, and asserts that it is the true church. The Protestant churches reject both, and claim that in the Protestant Church exists the true Church of Christ, and the power of the Holy Ghost. Then there are the extraordinary contradictions in the doctrines held by each. The Roman Church declares that we cannot be saved unless we are joined to it—that we cannot get to heaven but through it, for it alone has the keys of heaven. The Greek Church maintains that a disbelief in its tenets entails the loss of heaven. The Presbyterians and others say that only the "elect" are to be saved by "effectual calling;" and that by the decree of God some men are predestined unto everlasting death; and also that the number of both of these is so certain and definite that it cannot be increased or diminished. Wesleyans and Methodists affirm that all who believe in "the blood of Christ" will be saved; and others hold that through the crucifixion of Christ the whole would be saved, whether they believe or not. The Romish, Greek, and a portion of the Anglican Church claim to have the power to forgive sins; all the other Protestant churches pronounce this to be an abominable assumption, and that only God can forgive sins. The foregoing are only a few of the numerous points on which these so-called religious systems disagree, though they all claim to be based on the one book, the Bible, but they are sufficient to prove to all sensible people their unreliability and their superstitious character, also the need of a rational view regarding what true or natural religion really consists of, namely, righteous action, which includes love to God and love to man, and is summed up in "do right in all things and at all times" in accordance with the voice of God in each individual.

"Religion is a marvelous light,
Proceeding from within,
That charms and fills us with delight,
And makes us hate all sin.

Creeds are like shackles that divide,
Perplex, and gall mankind:
Love the elixir we confide
To heal, unite and bind.

Love—first to God, and then to man,—
To self, our neighbors, too—
To cheer us and to strengthen,
As our duties we pursue.

A sacred duty it imparts
And self consumes away—
It soothes and pacifies our hearts,
And aids us when we pray."

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of ourists or physicians to cure. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and head ache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial, postpaid. Call or write us about your case. We give advice free and positive proof of cures. A valuable book—Prof. Wilson's 100-page Dictionary of Disease, Free. THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

CONNECTED WORLDS.

A Lady's Interesting and Instructive Experience with the "Psyche" Board.

INTRODUCTION.

This short story contains not one word of fiction, but presents the strange experience of a lady, who, skeptic though she was, investigated occult phenomena by means of the magnetic board "Psyche."

The result was a lively intercourse with intelligences distinctly apart from her own, most messages characteristic of the correspondents, until one wicked influence tried to crowd out all the others and to take entire possession of the lady, posing as a departed friend once very dear to her.

He was unmasked at last and the psychic board entirely discarded, as presenting a wide avenue for promiscuous visitors. The real friend proved to be alive and well, on the other side of the Atlantic, while the impostor was traced to this country, by his last black deed on earth.

The lessons, for which the lady paid by many unpleasant experiences, were profitable in one essential point. They left no doubt about unseen individualities approaching the denizens of this earth under given conditions, while they offered not a shadow of support to the highly overworked theory of "The Sub-conscious Mind."

CONNECTED WORLDS.

He had made a deep impression upon her guileless young heart, but unfortunately not on hers alone. It was difficult indeed for any susceptible young woman to meet with indifference the honest gaze of his mild blue eyes, or glance at his refined features set within a frame of golden curls.

He knew it; he also appreciated it; why should he know? A young man without personal vanity seems just as abnormal as a young woman without that attribute; yet, in spite of paying attention to, and even flirting with numbers of fair specimens of the "gentler sex," there was one unassuming maiden whose quiet affection he silently reciprocated.

It is rather a disadvantage in some situations of life, to be childlike and ignorant of the ways of men and women in general. Jeanette's conception of a true lover did not admit of any flirting, however innocent, and when she perceived that Walter's heart was not altogether fire-proof against the charms of other women, her faith in him was shaken in its very foundation. Yet, the ties of affection between them being of solid fiber, it would not have been too late for a candid word and a satisfactory explanation; but that word was not spoken, that explanation was not given, not even when Walter's vocation led him far away from home.

No news arrived; no letters were exchanged, while busy gossips kept on reporting flirtations. Jeanette's pride at last conquered her heart. She called herself a fool for clinging to a flirt, and struggled bravely to banish the remnants of a disappointed love into the remotest corner of her wounded bosom.

Resolved to walk through life alone, she departed to foreign schools and did her best to drown the lingering sparks of love in the healing waters of that inexhaustible fountain called Knowledge, which never entirely forsakes its devotees, however different their capacities for absorbing its life-giving potions.

Alas for the fickleness of human resolutions! Jeanette was scarcely back from school, when she met a young man who also had resolved to walk through life alone; yet, at that very first meeting, both young people's resolutions were shaken.

He was an artist and had ideals; she was a poet and had ideals. He had strong impulses and was quick of action; she had been made miserable by a man of opposite characteristics. All this convened to tie the knot between them strongly enough to lead to engagement, though Jeanette never knew precisely whether it was the man or the artist that influenced her most.

She would have taken more time to consider, and examine the true state of her feelings, had not friends—busybodies as you find them all over the world—by tenging, gossiping, slandering, etc., etc., driven these relations to an untimely climax from which there was no return for a simple-minded, honest girl who never dreamed of trifling with her given word.

This faithfulness was put to a severe test right after engagement. Not having heard of Walter's return, Jeanette started when he suddenly came walking towards her in a public square, greeting her with the heartiness of former days, and unceremoniously taking his place at her side. He had evidently no suspicion of anything having come between them, neither did it occur to him that any explanations were needed on his side. He acted as if the few years separating them were just so many days.

In his exuberance of feeling, he did not notice Jeanette's dazed and confused condition, as she silently and mechanically walked along with him. Nearing the house of his parents, Walter asked her to enter. She did not hesitate, having always been on friendly terms with the family, but she disliked the fact of not finding them in, and bade him good-bye.

He, however, insisted on her staying for a few moments' talk, still oblivious of the evident change in her behavior towards him. His request startled her; nay, it alarmed her. Something spoke too plainly within her bosom, and intuition revealed the situation more and more clearly.

A few significant words on his part, though timidly spoken, capped the climax. She had to stop him or despise herself. Ah! why could not the dial of time be turned backwards? She had no right to listen to him now, after being engaged to another man.

Here would be a good chance for some chapters of interesting complications; of painful struggles between old love and new love; between pledged faith and reawakened feelings. Jealousy might transform the mild and timid Walter so much as to win back at last his sweetheart from the wild, impulsive Randolph, who might find another girl pining for him and one more suited to his tastes and nature than Jeanette. All might end in a double reunion and unspeakable happiness. But our story is no fiction and we cannot afford to mend the decrees of fate.

Must she tell him of that engagement? Could she do it? Her tongue refused, in spite of the conviction that this alone would explain her shrinking attitude. The more she felt that she had been mistaken in believing herself forgotten by him, the more she dreaded explanations. Come what might, she was not the woman to break her given word. She would not betray the man who unhesitatingly had offered her heart and hand. She did not stop to consider which of the two men would guarantee more happiness to herself, but which one would be more capable of bearing the loss of a woman's love, more apt to find a proper substitute and obtain after all, his full share of matrimonial bliss. This one was Walter; no doubt of it.

These thoughts flashed through Jeanette's mind quick as lightning. The struggle was short, but fierce, and the scar it left keeps the remembrance vivid to the end of her days.

Trusting to gossip to enlighten him about facts, she fled from Walter, sealing her fate, and leaving him in a state of utmost bewilderment. They met twice after this, but no word was spoken, and Walter's sullen looks were his only protest against the decree of fate. He never attempted to fight it, and Jeanette consequently felt more and more justified in her belief that her friend's feelings towards her were after all never deep enough to warrant that steadiness of affection which alone can assure true happiness in married life. Nearer she nestled to the heart of her impulsive, outspoken lover.

They separated; hundreds of miles were between them, and for fully two years they kept their relations only by exchanging loving thoughts in letters. There was no lack of temptations for Jeanette, but her loving heart proved a secure staff, and when Randolph at last pleaded for a speedy consummation of marriage, she hurried back to her native country. Soon he came to take her to his new scenes of artistic activity, a beautiful big city with charming surroundings and a social atmosphere entirely new to Jeanette.

Here her mental nature expanded and underwent radical changes; but her heart remained intact. Here she hoped to quietly educate her promising children, a boy and a girl; but Randolph's restless nature longed to rove, and off they went to foreign countries, gathering new experiences and filling their minds with all the impressions worth storing away there, in different climes and different civilizations, about which volumes might be written, but there are excellent books of travel already existing, amply covering the experiences of our little family; besides, this is only a more or less necessary explanatory sketch to make the sequel comprehensible.

After a number of years, the restless travelers landed at last within the vast boundaries of the United States. But Randolph did not find the States an El Dorado for artists, and it was only after endless hardships and struggles in other fields of endeavor, that some chemical knowledge he had gathered during his college days, led him to an invention that proved successful and put an end to their Bohemian life.

They settled down for good, while Randolph's lingering restlessness found gratification in the building of two homes, one in the Northeast, and another far South, thus allowing frequent changes of abode.

By this time the only daughter of the family had been happily married, while the only son, who had studied Natural Science, went to explore the wilds of Africa, braving the deadly fevers and falling a victim to them at the very moment when, after a whole year of courageous endeavor, he had turned his face toward the homeward shore.

It took seven weeks to carry the sad news to his parents, and while the fond mother was anxiously awaiting the news of her son's embarkation on the homeward-bound vessel, she was startled from sleep one early morning by the words: 'Your son is dead." Who spoke those words? Was it a dream? The usual scenes and conditions were missing—only those words: "Your son is dead."

But from Jeanette's agnostic standpoint, it could not be anything but a dream, and, though shivering, she said to herself: "If this dream means anything, it means a long life." This was a correct interpretation, although in a different sense from what she understood at the time.

Exultingly she greeted Fred's next letter, arriving soon after this "dream," where he approximately fixed the date of his departure, and spoke of his perfect health and his constitutional fitness for the climate. How proud Jeanette felt about not being "superstitious" and not having even noted down the date of that "silly dream." Poor deluded mother, the writer's hand was already mouldering in African soil. Some more weeks, and the paralyzing news came like a flash of lightning from a smiling sky.

Great grief defies description, so let us not attempt it.

The sorrow-stricken parents moved mechanically within their pleasant home, surrounded by groves of orange and palm and fanned by the breezes of the sounthern Atlantic. They were yet in a dazed condition, like people suddenly awakening under the influence of some horrible nightmare, but the nightmare was not to be shaken off; it grew more and more tangible; it was stern reality.

Alas! what are the consoling words of sympathizing friends! What is the soothing balm of nature so eloquently praised by our great poets! What are even the soul-stirring strains of heavenly music to us, while in the first throes of a consuming grief! The sun seems darkened, the sky of a leaden hue, the whispering leaves, the nodding flowers, the murmuring billows of the sea,—all seem nothing but an accompaniment to the one monotonous mournful tune, "Gone! gone!"

It is only after having struggled through the first stages of our grief that we again begin to have eyes to see and ears to hear, and then only do we slowly grow accessible to the chastening and cleansing and refining and soul-uplifting influences, that not alone bring lasting consolation, but prove in the end an inestimable blessing not to be obtained in any way, save by the agonies of our deepest grief.

However, from the very first, Jeanette felt sustained by a wonderful power she could not account for, that even enabled her to sustain Randolph, who seemed a helpless victim to utter despair. Whenever the pangs of grief threatened to overcome her, a faint and soothing voice within spoke words of comfort that fell as balm into the open wound. She could not account for them, although her skepticism was shaken in its foundation, it needed stronger facts to overthrow it entirely.

One night she was suddenly awakened by an illumination at the foot end of her bed, and then, right in the midst of a circle of light, she saw the well-remembered figure of her son, his face wistfully towards her, slowly crossing the room and disappearing at the nearest window. The next moment all was dark again, and Jeanette's mind was vividly impressed by these words: "Fred is alive, he is walking in the light."

The Harmony of Spirit Forces at Lake Brady.

As I sit here in the quiet shadow of the dense wood at Lake Brady this Sunday afternoon and write, I am thoroughly impressed with the quiet, restful feeling of repose at this beautiful spiritual camp. The atmosphere is delightful, the day a most perfect one, the sun's rays are subdued by a soft haze, while the breeze from the southwest brings a cooling odor of woodmould and the perfumes of wild meadow flowers, all making the most harmonious vibrations, soothing to the lover of nature and bringing a quieting influence, the effect of which leaves an imprint on the soul and makes us feel that we are really children of Nature and of God, and that God is good, for at just such times as this, when we are in perfect accord and in harmony with our surroundings, do we feel that God is near us.

It is beautiful, it is inspiring, lofty, and we should make it our duty to come in rapport with this feeling as often as possible, for the effect must make us better in every sense, truer to ourselves and our God.

PEDAGOGY OF RACES.

The Rise and Decline of Peoples.

Dr. G. Stanley Hall, president of Clark University, says of Race education, that missionaries must be sympathetic to accomplish the best results. They should revive the old native religion in its best form, and at the right time, in the right way bring in the graft of a higher faith. He says man is a great exterminator, and that his warfare has been going on for ages; that whole tribes of mankind are crowded, fought out of existence. That the American Indians have a quality of chivalry, but notice how this race is limited and hedged about by the whites. They can own no land, the title must remain in the United States government. He cannot paint—a sacred custom. He cannot leave the reservations without special permission. Worst of all he cannot celebrate his native dances. The Indian's dance is his religion. The Indian is good, but he has the misfortune always to be misunderstood. His spirit is broken and he is on the way to extermination.

He says that some of these peoples, now being exterminated, have possibilities that might make of them great nations of the world. He attributes the increasing mortality in East India the result of recent famines, to the presidence of Great Britain; that the East Indians formerly hoarded their rice and grain against famine times, but the British thought they knew better and taxed the rice for a famine fund. When the famine came the famine fund was not at hand. The savages develop many diseases of civilization and suffer greatly because of them. We need a higher colonial policy. The savage must be studied and understood before he can be reformed, as the child must be studied and understood before he can be educated with the best results.

This picture of Dr. Hall's suggests whether the time is not fully ripe for a new order of college on earth; for a new order of education; for even the best form that the two worlds combined can institute. Give the colleges and universities now existing credit for probity and noble motives, and then is there not room for doubt whether they yet know it all? If evolution does not apply to education, what is it good for? Is the earth civilization yet fully civilized? How many men out of a thousand could be elected as truly enlightened models?

This does not suggest discouragement. It suggests rather cause for gratulation that so much improvement is apparent over the first man. Past generations have worked for us. We would be ungrateful not to work for generations ahead.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Ten or twelve men were discussing politics and secular matters on Pennsylvania avenue in Washington on the Lord's day. Up came a sanctimonious man and said: "You fellows ought to be thinking of the Lord Jesus Christ." "Who is he, and what do you know about him?" asked one of the men. Other questions followed, not relished by the intruder, who said: "Is there no one here who will stand up and help me in the Lord's cause?" "Let's take a vote," was the reply; "all who do not believe in the Lord Jesus Christ hold up their hands." All hands were raised. "The Lord forgive you," was the parting word of the pious man.

Mrs. R. C. Simpson, formerly a prominent medium of this city, is visiting her son, at No. 231 Baird street, Austin, Ill.

T. W. Sherk writes: "Spiritual services were conducted by Mr. H. F. Contes, at Kenwood hall, 43d street and Cottage Grove avenue, as usual, last Sunday, both afternoon and evening. These meetings will be continued all summer. Both meetings were well-attended and much interest was manifested. At the afternoon conference meeting Mrs. Moulton read a short but forceful essay on the power of thought, concluding with some inspiring remarks on the same subject. Dr. Hewitt lectured in the morning and succeeded in arousing his audience to a high degree of enthusiasm. The messages by Mr. Contes were listened to with rapt attention. When the meeting closed it seemed as if most of those present wanted the medium's card and The Progressive Thinker."

Correspondent writes from Texas: "The annual meeting of the Texas State National Association of Spiritualists will be held Sept. 5, 6, 7 and 8, at the Spiritualist Temple, Galveston, Texas. Here Mr. John W. Ring is in charge of a prosperous society which is comfortable in its own Temple. He is earnest in the Lyceum movement, recognizing how necessary it is for the growth of Spiritualism. Mrs. Laura B. Payne is doing an excellent work in Dallas, Ft. Worth and Hillsboro. She endears herself to the people wherever she goes, with her patient, earnest efforts. She will minister to the friends in Waco, Robinson, Clear Creek and Houston, on her way to the meeting in Galveston. Houston is keeping in slow but certain action through the entire summer. The Rev. M. D. Tenney has ministered to the Spiritualists there on several occasions."

Rev. F. A. Bisbee, D. D., editor of the Universalist Leader, closes a review of Dr. Bland's book, "In the World Celestial," with these words: "No theme is so sacred as that which touches the great spiritual world; no theme ever can command such eager interest by human hearts; and the dreams of today and those of yesterday will be read through the to-morrows until the great reality prove them dreams." Here is a practical admission that the Bible from which the clergy draw their inspiration, and upon which their system of theology rests, is but a book of dreams. This proves that the preachers are as thoroughly agnostic as were Huxley or Ingersoll.

"You'll be at my wake to-morrow night," said John Abern, for fifty years an oiler at the Chicago avenue water works, to Patrick Gannon. The statement was made on the morning of Aug. 11. He soon after passed to spirit life, his prediction proving true.

A press dispatch says: "A ball of fire which hovers over the locality in which lived the late John Shaneman, and a mysterious animal which vanishes into thin air when pursued, are causing a commotion in Norton township, Ohio. It is said these weird objects represent the spirit of Shaneman returned to earth to try to show relatives where he concealed his fortune. Shaneman's death occurred about six years ago. The night he died John Breitenstein, who was a candidate for county commissioner two years ago, and is a reputable man in every way, and Peter Shaffer, also a worthy citizen, were sitting up with the dead at the Shaneman home. On that night the ball of fire was first seen. It came from nowhere visible, but hovered about the ceiling of the room in such a way that Breitenstein and Shaffer both left the place very much frightened. For a long time nothing further was seen, but lately the ball of fire has been observed in all sorts of places. Breitenstein says one night recently the fire ball awakened him by appearing close beside his bedroom window. The animal spoken of frequents the abandoned Keith coal mine. It is in the form of a wolf, but although many have seen it, no one has been near it except Gene Cady and John Stanton of Barberton. They pursued the mysterious creature and came near enough to have struck the animal, but when they tried to do so it vanished and faded away like a shadow."

Mrs. Wm. B. Cook writes from Akron, Ohio.: "Mr. Wm. A. Arent and Mrs. Mary A. McFarland, clairvoyant and trance medium, of Camp Brady, Ohio, held a very pleasant and successful meeting August 10, at the home of Mr. Geo. H. Payne, 126 Pearl street. Both Mr. Arent and Mrs. McFarland made many friends during their short stay in our city."

Mrs. L. M. Clark writes from Lawton, Oklahoma: "Two years ago we commenced our home circle, and at the second one my son went under the control of an Indian chief. In a short time we got real good trumpet work, and very large spirit lights. Forms were seen very often. My son sees, hears and talks real well under control of different spirits. There are many here who are waiting to know the truth. It is a fine field to work in. I wish all home circles God's love."

F. Platto, M. D., writes: "How any Spiritualist can get along without such a paper as The Progressive Thinker, and the great and good books which you are almost giving away, is beyond my comprehension. Spiritual food seems to be as necessary for my well-being as that which nourishes my physical being."

G. W. Kates and wife are serving at several camps during the entire month of August. They had very large meetings at Grand Ledge, Mich., Sunday, August 10. They will be at Vicksburg, Mich., 16 to 18; Clinton, Iowa, 19 to 25; Waukesha, Wis., 26 to 31. Address them accordingly.

G. C. Howard writes: "I take the Arena, The Literary Digest and The Denver Weekly News, but rather have The Progressive Thinker than all the others combined."

Geo. F. Perkins writes from Sacramento, Cal.: "I am contemplating propositions for public lectures upon Spiritualism and the science of Psycho-Biology which embraces all the methods of character and life-reading from phrenology to astrology, and in this work I will be ably assisted by the eminent Australian phrenologist and palmist, Prof. J. P. de Blumenthal, who is abundantly able to demonstrate his particular specialities. We shall hold Spiritual meetings Sundays, and devote the week evenings to demonstrations of our philosophy and science, including health lectures and the sale of the Vitae-Ore remedies. At present the Professor and myself are associated at 527 J street, Sacramento, Cal. All communications to either will reach us and will receive prompt attention. Spiritualism is sadly in need of advocates in this location. We shall try to fill the bill."

G. H. Brooks writes: "I have just returned from filling my engagement with the Grand Ledge (Mich.) camp. There was a very good attendance, and the camp was a very harmonious one. Mrs. Sheets presides with dignity, and wields a harmonious influence wherever she goes. I visited Briggs Park camp on my way to Grand Ledge, for one day. I enjoyed meeting the many old-time friends there as well as at Grand Ledge. I am at home now. Will respond to calls for funerals while at home. Send all telegrams to 114 President street, Wheaton, Ill."

Mrs. L. J. Vaughn and Mr. B. Vaughn are now located at 3146 Wabash avenue. Mrs. Vaughn met with a severe fall which has laid her up for three weeks.

Spiritualist camp-meeting at Forest Park, Ottawa, Kans., Aug. 22 to Aug. 31 inclusive. Principal speakers are Mrs. A. L. Lull, of Lawrence; Hon H. H. Benson; A. Scott Bledsoe, president State Spiritual Association, Topeka; Mrs. E. B. Bledsoe, Topeka. Many prominent mediums will be present, and a fine time is anticipated.

Charles A. Kiehl writes: "The First Church of Spiritualism, Williamsport, Pa., will start winter meetings, Sept 7.. Mrs. R. W. Barton has been secured to serve this society during September and November. We should like very much to hear from test mediums, and speakers desiring engagements with this society. Mr. E. W. Sprague and wife will be here during September. There is every indication of success for this society in its efforts to promote Spiritualism in this vicinity."

Grand Union Picnic at Unity Camp, Saugus Center, Mass., under the auspices of the Lynn Spiritualist Association, Labor Day, September 1. There will be games of various kinds, including beauty contests, fat women and fat men's races, three-legged races, potato races, peanut and doughnut contests and many others. Prizes will be distributed to the successful contestants. All Spiritualists in Massachusetts and their friends are cordially invited. Chowders and the usual refreshments will be on sale for those who do not care to bring their lunch. Members of visiting societies will be served tea or coffee free.

B. F. Savery, of Ypsilanti, Mich., called on his way to Marquette, Mich., on a vacation, and took away with him the last premium, and like many others, has the whole nine premiums, the "Premium Library."

Anna L. Gillespie writes from 4312 Greenwood avenue, Chicago: "The week ending July 7 was a delightful one, the attendance of campers unusually large, and when Sunday came it brought a very large audience. The morning service was given over to the lyceum children first. They presented a delightful programme consisting of songs, drills, recitations, and instrumental music, all given with a grace that made it most pleasant. This was followed by an address by the writer on the subject of 'Children's Rights.' In the afternoon an address by Mrs. May Sewall, of Indianapolis, was listened to by a delighted audience. Mrs. Sewall is a fine orator, and her subject, 'Internationalism,' was handled in a splendid manner. Then came the event of the day, the tests given by Edgar Emerson. I have heard Mr. Emerson many times, but never heard his do better work than this day. The auditorium was crowded and every one was delighted as message after message was given, and as night fell and the stars came out we all felt that the day at old Camp Chesterfield had been a day full of happiness and comfort. I left for Chicago that night, and will remain at Mrs. Field's until August 27, when I will start for the dear home and loved ones in San Francisco."

Rena D. Chapman writes from Grand Ledge Camp, Mich., "The annual meeting of the Michigan State Spiritual Association was held at Lansing, August 12, 1902. Delegates were there from nearly all societies in the state. The meeting was called to order by the president. Election of officers resulted as follows: President, B. O'Dell, Paw Paw; vice-president, E. E. Carpenter, Detroit; secretary, Rena D. Chapman, Marcellus; treasurer, O. E. Spaulding, Lansing. The state board is about to close a bargain for the purchase of a home for its disabled mediums, and donations will gladly be received; sending such to the secretary. With the help of all Spiritualists we will try to make this the best year in the history of our noble cause."

Vicksburg Camp, Mich.

Thursday, National Day, was one of frequent showers, and many were kept away who had hoped to be in attendance, but with the stirring addresses of both Harrison D. Barrett and E. W. Sprague, we who were present were not only highly entertained by logical discourses, but received a better understanding of the workings of the N. S. A. and of the benefits of organization.

On Friday Mr. and Mrs. Sprague and daughter, Mrs. Marie Holden, took their departure for Haslett Park and Grand Ledge. We miss their kind words and pleasant faces, but others will gain what we have lost. The tests given by both Mr. and Mrs. Sprague were an attractive feature of each session.

The conference Saturday forenoon was well attended, and with mediumship for our topic some very interesting thoughts were expressed.

An appreciative audience was in attendance at the afternoon session. The lecture by Mr. Barrett was highly instructive.

The second Sunday dawned clear, but clouds kept gathering to cast a shadow over the earth, then breaking away to let the sun shine through, but threatening clouds could not keep earnest seekers after spiritual truths away from camp, and at an early hour a large audience was waiting the appearance of the speaker of the day.

Promptly at 10 o'clock the meeting opened with a beautiful song by Mrs. Russell. Mr. Barrett then recited "Leona" by James G. Clark, following this poem with an address that was both elevating and instructive. His subject was "Death is but Action Begun."

As the hour drew near for the afternoon meeting, the people assembled to listen to Mr. Barrett for the last time this season. His subject, "Spiritualism, a Religion for This Life," was handled in a touching and soulful manner and all who had the pleasure of listening to the discourse of one hour must be impressed with the idea of living a kinder and truer life in the home, among neighbors, and among friends. He said in part: "We too often wait till our friends have taken their departure from the physical form to speak kind words of them or strew their pathway with flowers."

A conference meeting was held in the evening and so closed the meetings of the day.

Monday at 10 o'clock the class in physical culture met with an increased attendance and great interest manifested. Conference was held in the afternoon.

Tuesday afternoon Mrs. Newton, of Kalamazoo, delivered an address that was uplifting to all aspiring minds.

Wednesday was State Day. The State having elected new officers at their convention held at Lansing, Tuesday, the affairs of the State were considered, and a collection taken to further State interests by putting missionaries into the field, and to enlarge the funds for supporting a medium's home. H. L. Chapman, of Marcellus, was the speaker of the day.

Among the mediums present are Chas. Barnes, trumpet medium; J. R. Klauser, trance medium, and Joseph King, materializing medium. Both J. R. Klauser and Chas. Barnes kindly consented to give tests from the platform after Mr. Barrett's Sunday lecture, and greatly interested a crowd of eager listeners.

Mrs. Klauser is kept busy giving readings in palmistry, phrenology and astrology.

Dr. Johnson, of Battle Creek, made our camp a visit Tuesday and Wednesday. Mr. and Mrs. John Stillwell, of Lawton, are tending here this season. Mr. Stillwell is president of Bankson Lake Camp.

CORA FULLER, Sec'y.

Onset Camp.

I am going to let the readers of The Progressive Thinker know what a delightful time we have been having at Onset. We have had a feast for the gods.

Our Woman's Congress has been a great success. We have listened to some of the finest addresses it has ever been our pleasure to listen to. The temple and the auditorium were magnificently decorated with the colors of the Congress, yellow and white, and American flags from the top of the speakers' stand; in the auditorium flags of all nations were flying, and the whole atmosphere was alive with the spirit of the occasion.

The addresses by Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn and Mrs. Kate R. Stiles were a power. The address by Rev. Anna Shaw, "The Power of the Incentive," was a masterly one. The address of Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt was of the finest, and the lecture by Mrs. Carrie F. Loring was one that should be listened to by all. Her lecture was upon the children, those that are the victims of vice, and degenerate fathers and mothers. She had photographs of many of these poor unfortunates, showing the scars, and many were mere skeletons when taken away from their inhuman parents; she also displayed the implements of torture that had been taken away from some of these homes. It was a lecture never to be forgotten, and it certainly made every father and mother feel that each individually had a work to do toward the uplifting of humanity.

The music furnished for the congress was under the direction of Miss Orissa Forrester, by twelve young ladies, and great credit was due this young lady for her successful directorship; every one was pleased, and thought the music far in advance of former years.

One of the chief attractions at Onset is the School of Philosophy, which has been established here, and the following people have been and will be the instructors in the same: W. J. Colville, B. F. Austin, B. A., D. D., Miss Susie C. Clark and Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond. These classes are very well attended, and our Spiritualist friends are studying the higher thought so they can realize better the method of right living.

The opera that was held at the Temple, August 7-8, was of high order, and was very successful in every detail. It was under the direction of Mr. N. W. Leavitt, of Putnam, Conn.

Weather at Onset delightful.

IMPORTANT SUGGESTION

To the Spiritualists of the United States, Especially the Delegates to the N. S. A. Convention in Boston, October 21, 22, 23, 24, 1902.

Greetings to You All:—The good of the cause and the greatest success of this noble organization; is my only motive, object and aim.

It is well known by all my friends, and many others, that I have devoted my life for more than forty years, to the profession of medicine. During this time, I have attended many medical conventions, both state and national. I have been a member of the American Institute of Homeopathy for over thirty years. During this time and in attending these medical conventions, I have learned some things which I think would be well for us to act upon, in producing the greatest harmony and the most success in the management of this national body of Spiritualists. No one can be more anxious for the success of the N. S. A. than myself. For I see only one hope for the future success of Spiritualism, to use the same, making of it the highest and most practical humanitarian work; that is, by organization.

The N. S. A. has done and is doing a grand work for Spiritualism and humanity. No one can fail to appreciate the noble work done by its worthy president and his fellow-workers, and of all the efficient workers; and what I am going to say or suggest is not because anyone can fill his place, or any of the officers' places any better than he or they have done.

Now, in the American Medical Association, or the American Institute of Homeopathy, we strive each year to elect the most cultured and efficient men and women in the ranks to fill the different offices, president, vice-president, etc. Yet, none of the officers, except the secretary and treasurer, ever serve more than one year, it matters not how capable they are, or how satisfactory their work; each year the honor is conferred upon other worthy members. The members of the Board of Censors are chosen for one, two, or three years; so all the time some old member is on this important board. The same treasurer has filled his place in the convention which I attended in June in Cleveland, for many years; the one preceding him, as long as his health would permit; same way with the secretary. It is often filled by someone for years. Yet, as I have said before, all of the important offices are changed each year. What is the effect of this? Where is the wisdom? It keeps in check and completely suppresses all envy and jealousy, and stimulates a laudable ambition for every member of this vast body to make themselves so useful that honor shall come to them, at least once in their lives. Has not the N. S. A. reached the point in its organization when it would be well for such an action to be adopted? Will not this course, if pursued, bring harmony, strength, peace and greater success to the N. S. A., and increase its power in all directions?

The president, secretary and treasurer know all about the business and financial matters that pertain to the N. S. A. Then with one accord, outside of these offices, would it not be well to elect entirely new men and women to every office that will be vacated this coming October? This is not said because anyone has not done well, but because all have done well, because all are true and faithful servants. There are plenty of noble, old and faithful workers in the Spiritualist ranks that can be found to fill each place honorably, faithfully and successfully.

Still further, all who are now in office, on leaving their places for others, if they love the cause as they should, will do all they can to aid their successors.

I give these hints for what they are worth, and because I love the cause of Spiritualism and the success of the N. S. A., and not because I want any office or would accept any, myself.

May the Divine in you all and the spirit world aid you as delegates in this coming convention to forget self for the good you can do. Yours fraternally,

ANDREW B. SPINNEY, M. D.

Lake Brady Camp, O.

On Saturday, August 9, a conference was held at 2 p. m., subject "Love and Charity." Saturday evening a test seance was held by C. H. Figures for the benefit of the camp.

On Sunday, Mr. D. A. Herrick spoke to a large audience, the morning subject being "The Advancement of Modern Spiritualism;" that of the afternoon, "Religion of the Present Day." Both lectures were full of thought and interest for those who wish to become well versed in the truths of Spiritualism.

Mrs. Heaton, of Akron, O., who assists at all the Sunday meetings, gave a beautiful vocal solo at the opening of the afternoon session. Mr. Marquart, also of Akron, gave a fine violin solo by request.

Mr. C. H. Figures gave tests in his usual convincing manner. One must be a skeptic indeed to doubt the presence of the spirit friends after listening to him.

In the evening, Mr. D. A. Herrick gave a trumpet seance, which was largely attended.

On Tuesday evening, Mrs. Gertrude Heinsohn, pastor of the German Spiritualist Society, of Cleveland, gave a seance which consisted mostly of psychometric readings, the proceeds being for the Lake Brady camp.

MARY L. BETTES, Sec'y.

Waukesha Camp, Wis.

I feel that I must write a word about the Waukesha Camp, and the Morris Pratt Institute.

The camp is in a most charming spot, and I think that any one who might visit it would agree with me.

To-day thirteen of us went to Whitewater to see the Institute. Words of mine are indeed feeble in expressing my astonishment and delight. Whitewater is a most delightful place. Mrs. Stewart has not overdrawn, when she has tried to picture the Institute, in your mind's eye. It is far beyond my ideas of what it might be, and to-day as I went with the others through the many rooms, I felt very proud to think that my name is placed on the list of life members. It would enthuse any one to visit the Institute, and I hope that all who can will do so.

Pa and Ma Pratt furnished a splendid dinner for us, then we adjourned to the auditorium, where we had a spiritual feast, and we left feeling that we all had been indeed blessed. I feel like saying, as the little children: Please, God, bless Pa and Ma Pratt.

And Mrs. Stewart is the right person in the right place.

Lily Dale Camp.

Friday, August 8, Hon. John J. Lentz filled the vacancy made by the non-arrival of Mr. Charles B. Patterson, who at the last moment cancelled his engagement, on the plea of over-work. The auditorium was crowded, and after the Parker-Bowens had rendered one of their rich musical treats, Mr. Lentz delivered one of the best addresses ever given from this rostrum. Judging from its acceptance by the large and enthusiastic audience there were no regrets that Mr. Lentz was the speaker of the afternoon.

Saturday morning, J. Clegg Wright gave his class lecture, and in the afternoon a symposium was arranged to fill Mr. Paterson's second vacancy. The subject under discussion was Organization; Lyman C. Howe, J. Clegg Wright, A. B. Richmond, Prof. Lockwood, Mrs. Curran, Mrs. Calvert and others taking part. The Parker-Bowens again rendered a beautiful song selection.

The meeting was followed by the gathering of the people who were present from Ohio to discuss the advisability of organization.

The week's work closed with the usual Saturday evening dance, which was truly a success as far as numbers went, there being hardly standing-room in the auditorium, many coming from near-by towns to join in the revelry and fascination of the hour.

Sunday Prof. Lockwood and the Rev. Anna Shaw spoke to a crowded audience, both forenoon and afternoon. Notwithstanding the clouded aspect of the weather, several hundred people gathered to hear the lectures, while as many more wandered over the beautiful grounds.

Maggie Gaule is again with us and gave platform tests at the close of the afternoon service.

The Bangs Sisters are daily expected, and the remaining weeks of the session promise to be even more interesting than the weeks that have passed.

Monday, August 18, is Canadian Day, and preparations are afoot to make it a lively occasion.

Sunday evening, Solon Parker and sister, Mrs. Bowen, of Versailles, N. Y., assisted by Mrs. Beach, gave a concert in the auditorium. This combination is certainly a fine one, and the storms of applause which greeted each rendition attested the appreciation of a crowded house.

Tuesday J. Clegg Wright occupied the rostrum in the morning with his class lecture. Large audiences attend each of these classes, and enthusiasm runs high in regard to this most important work of Messrs. Wright and Lockwood. This is an important work to Spiritualism, and should receive the support of all liberal-minded Spiritualists who are able to donate to the public good. Send in your donations of $1, $5 or $10 and help the C. L. F. A. in this laudable work of making such classes free for all.

Harrison D. Barrett spoke to a very large and enthusiastic audience in the afternoon on the subject, "Some Settled Questions." His lecture was brimfull of good things from start to finish.

Wednesday was Woman's Day, and was celebrated accordingly. The morning exercises consisted of a symposium in which the following speakers took part: Mrs. Craig, of Texas, Mrs. Calvert, Mrs. McDonald, of Toronto; Mrs. Reed, of Detroit; and Miss Anthony—Susan B.

Music by the Northwestern orchestra. Mrs. Ely, solo. In the afternoon, Rev. Anna Shaw delivered the address of the day. The auditorium was filled to its seating capacity and crowds wandered over the grounds.

Monday, Mrs. Grace Orr gave an address on Palmistry, in the afternoon. A benefit for the Marion Skidmore library was held in the Auditorium in the evening. An interesting programme was carried out, in which Lyman C. Howe, J. Clegg Wright, Mr. Parker, Mrs. Bowen, Mrs. Parkess and Mrs. Hatfield Pettibone took part, Mrs. Pettibone giving platform tests. She gives names rapidly and locates them correctly. Mr. and Mrs. Pettibone are old-time mediums at Lily Dale, and are among the reliable stand-bys of the camp, their work being among the best.

Mrs. Miller-Wilcox gave a benefit to the Willing Workers in which the physical manifestations were most wonderful. The Wednesday evening dance, following Woman's Day, was a great success as to numbers, standing-room being at a premium.

Prof. Lockwood, J. Clegg Wright, H. D. Barrett and J. W. Colville are the speakers for the balance of this week, Mr. Colville commencing his work on Friday, the 15th.

Cool weather, but a good attendance, and interesting meetings keep up the life of the camp.

MARY WEBB-BAKER.

Grand Ledge Camp, Mich.

The Old Folks Concert given last Friday by George H. Brooks, was well attended and was a grand success. Sixteen numbers were given, and all who participated, showed great talent. Mrs. Lizzie Evans, a fine soprano singer, of Lansing, rendered two solos, which were well received.

Saturday evening a surprise was planned for Mr. George Letford, and he was given a beautiful bouquet of flowers, Mr. Geo. W. Kates making the presentation speech. A fine banquet was served, covers being laid for 75, after which all adjourned to the auditorium where they tripped the light fantastic toe for several hours.

A progressive pedro party was given by the campers Monday evening, in hotel parlors.

Wednesday was a gala day at our camp. Although the weather was threatening, about 75 of the townspeople picnicked on these beautiful grounds.

The regular Wednesday evening dancing parties are becoming a prominent feature of our camp, and are much enjoyed by old and young alike.

Mrs. Addie Nesbitt, of Chicago, accompanied by Miss Josephine Gray, of Berlin, Germany, are spending a week at camp.

Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates have just completed their week's engagement at our camp. Mr. Kates is a logical and philosophical speaker, and Mrs. Kates is in the foremost ranks as a test mediums, her messages being concise and clean-cut, satisfying to Spiritualists and, convincing to skeptics. Their many friends wish them unbounded success, and hope they may be with us another year.

Saturday, August 16, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague will be with us, and take up their work of the following week. These workers come to us laden with the spiritual fruits of many years experience, as they (as well as Mr. and Mrs. Kates) have worked faithfully in the missionary field.

The attendance this year at camp has far exceeded the expectations of the the association, and at the present time the hotel is taxed to the utmost to accommodate the people.

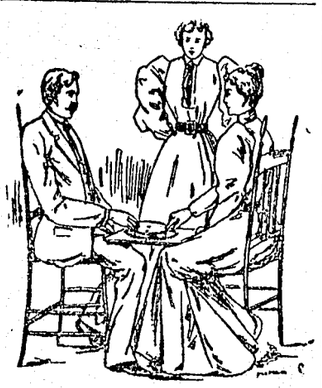
HAY FEVER AND ASTHMA CURED BY THE Kola Plant.



The Kola Plant.

A New and Positive Cure for HAY-FEVER and ASTHMA has been found in the Kola Plant, a rare botanic product of West African origin. So great are the powers of this New Remedy that in the short time since its discovery it has come into almost universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America for the cure of every form of Hay-Fever and Asthma. Its cures are really marvelous. Men, women and children who have been given up as incurable are being restored daily to perfect health by the use of Himalya. Thousands of letters attesting its wonderful cures have been written the importers, but limited space prevents a detailed list. Read what a few have to say, proving that Hay-Fever and Asthma can be cured:

Mr. J. B. Ayle, Estherville, Iowa, writes, Feb. 28th, 1902, that he was cured of Hay-Fever and Asthma after severe suffering for 28 years, Miss Eva Preston, Petersburg, Ind., writes March 8th, 1902, that she suffered untold misery for 18 years with Hay-Fever and Asthma. Is completely cured, although her physician said that a cure was impossible in her case. Wm. Kuhler, Sr., Warrenton, Mo., writes Dec. 22nd, was cured of Hay-Fever and Asthma of five year's standing, and that his son was also cured after many years of similar suffering. Mr. J. W. Cully, No. 1159 W. Lafayette Ave., Jacksonville, Ill., writes March 10th, 1902: "I traveled a great deal for relief from Asthma; climate of Michigan and Minnesota gave temporary relief, but Himalya entirely cured me." Rev. J. L. Coombs, Martinsburg, W. Va., writes to the New York World, July 22nd, that it cured him of Asthma of 30 years' standing. Mrs. Emaline Bolton, No. 389 Comarros St., Philadelphia, Pa., writes March 9th, 1902, was completely cured two years ago, and says Himalya is the only Asthma medicine that has merit, and she has tried them all. Mr. C. B. Slade, Los Angeles, Cal., writes March 8th, 1902, that Himalya saved his life. He told numbers of sufferers about his cure, and Himalya did not fail in a single case.

If you suffer from Hay-Fever and Asthma in any form, do not despair, but write at once to the Kola Importing Co., No. 1162 Broadway, New York City, N. Y., who in order to prove the power of this wonderful new botanic discovery will send you one Trial Case by mail, entirely Free. Remember it costs you absolutely nothing.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH --OR-- DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gifts, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I here had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. Bible Spiritualist: Q. Will you give me a list of passages in the Bible sustaining trumpet speaking and the so-called levitation, or suspension of the medium in the air without material support?

A. Trumpet speaking: Ex. xix:13, 16, 19; xx:18; Revelations 1:10. Levitation, I. Kings xviii:12; Ezekiel iii:12, 13, 14 and viii: 3; Acts viii: 39.

Querist: Q. What of the expressed opinions of scientists that there is farther imminent danger at Martinique?

A. No scientist has expressed prophetic opinion, as this question would lead the reader to infer. Disaster is the exception in nature's rule, and only the half-informed, and those with minds warped by theological training predict coming ruin. The West India Islands are the tops of submerged mountains, more or less volcanic. These mountains form a continuation sweeping in a great curve from the range passing through Central America and Mexico, and South through South America. Along this entire range are active volcanoes, which form the safety valves to regulate the pressure of internal forces. That now and then these forces are restrained until they burst their fetters with awful violence, is not alarming for it is, and must be local, except the earth vibrations it may produce. There may be, and necessarily will be other eruptions at Martinique, but the idea of the submergence of that island, or any of the group, is not to be entertained for a moment.

As long as credulity flourishes in ignorance and religious superstition, prophets will arise, some in uncouth language, others in the sounding phraseology of science, and following the model furnished by Jeremiah, predict pestilence, war and general ruin. It is a crime to publish such prophecies in the face of the fair world.

Dr. Buchanan made temporary notoriety and posthumous shame by such Jeremiads, not a line of which was fulfilled.

An ignorant negro has recently half-depopulated the city of Cleveland of its colored citizens by a prediction that a great wave would soon wash over the place. And now comes another proclaiming the overwhelming of Atlantic City by a tidal wave, and sane and ordinarily well-informed people at least listen and are influenced thereby! What a hold the heredity of belief has on mankind.

The island has not subsided as reported, or at least it has not sufficiently to be observed. Prof. W. L. Moore, chief of the U. S. Weather Bureau, says that "nothing can be more foolish" than the report of such subsidence, which could be proven only by months of scientific survey work.

Another correspondent, H. H. M., asks if it is true that the dust thrown from this volcano has anything to do with the weather as claimed.

Not in the least. Dust in the atmosphere changes the color of the sky to a reddish hue, but the theory advanced that such dust causes rain, by moisture condensing on the particles, is without the least foundation and opposed to facts.

The weather depends on the direction of the great atmospheric currents, and if the moon, volcanoes, or forests have any influence it is so slight that it is difficult to observe.

There are forests because the region is swept by such moisture bearing currents, and not such currents because there are forests. There are arid regions because only dry currents of air pass over them. All such predictions come from minds unbalanced by brooding over the biblical prophecies, or in some cases perhaps, from egotistical conceit and vanity taking this short cut to notoriety.

HIS GHOSTLY GUIDE.

A True Story of the Early Days of Spiritualism.

In writing this account of a genuine ghost walk, a materialized spirit's strange perambulations, and of the mortal who was compelled by some psychological influence to follow him, I have no apologies to offer to the readers of The Progressive Thinker. It is an authenticated narrative of what occurred to my own grandfather, and was verified point by point, by my own mother, before writing it out. It is not likely that she is mistaken in the matter, since the facts were indelibly stamped upon her memory, child as she was when her father related his strange story to his wondering family, followed so soon as it was by his tragic death.

Levi Tarr, my grandfather, moved in 1844 from Crawford county, Ohio, to Washington township, Defiance county, Ohio, where he bought land and settled. He was one of the well known citizens of the township, and the story of his ghostly pilgrimage, followed so closely by his death, and other deaths that in some way seemed to be connected with his strange pilgrimage, was generally accepted as truth, and I do not know of any one who was disposed to contradict it.

At that time the country was nearly all woods, with very indifferent roads, if roads they might be called, and after living there till the spring of 1848, Mr. Tarr concluded to move back to Crawford county, temporarily at least. Accordingly he sold his cattle, hogs, etc., retaining his team of oxen, and began making preparations to move. In the latter part of May, one day, he took his team and started to go to his mother-in-law's place, something over three miles distant. She (Mrs. Elizabeth Pierce) was a widow, and lived with her son, Wm. Pierce, Jr., and family, and M. K. Pierce. He had heard that a sister-in-law, Mary Pierce, was sick, and that they had been making home-brewed beer, which was made from various roots and herbs, with yeast, and sometimes a little whisky was put in to improve it. This beer, however, was solely used for medical purposes. So he took a pint of whisky along, and when he arrived at a neighbor's named John Ginter, about a mile from his destination, he left his team and went on foot the remainder of the trip, and after visiting a few hours, he started back.

About a quarter of a mile distant, in a little hollow which is now between a church and a graveyard, a man suddenly stepped from the bushes at the side of the road, and said, "Follow me!" After a little parley, Mr. Tarr, for no particular reason except that he felt that he had to do as he was told, followed the man, who from the general description remembered to have been given, was dressed in corduroy pants, with suspenders, white shirt, and wore a straw hat. His eye-lashes were several inches long, in fact no man had ever been seen that had such long lashes. It was quite dark when the man appeared, but it immediately became very light, so that the roads and paths traveled were very clearly seen. The man had a peculiar habit of stripping his suspenders upon his shoulders with his fingers occasionally.

As they walked along they came within hailing distance of Andrew Pierce's house, which was about a quarter of a mile east of Ginter's. Mr. Tarr insisted on calling out to Mr. Pierce as they went through the woods. The man insisted that he didn't need to. However, he called out and received a reply. Again he called and again was answered.

"That's Math," said Mr. Tarr.

"No," said the man, "it is Andy."

So they went on and on, past houses and places where Mr. Tarr had never been before. Finally they came to a dam of logs across the little stream called Prairie Creek, near where it empties into another stream called Lick Creek, and where two of the early settlers, Israel Phillips and George W. Ury, had put up a little sawmill. The dam looked dangerous to cross on, and Mr. Tarr objected to crossing, saying he could not swim and might fall in.

"Come on," said the man, "you've only one more dam to cross," and thus urged, he passed safely over the dam. At midnight they arrived at the home of John Cameron, on the bank of Lick Creek, in Tiffin township, something over a mile from Mr. Tarr's home, and found Mrs. Cameron out in the yard milking a cow.

She told Mr. Tarr many things, some that he might tell, and others that "he would stutter all the days of his life" if he told, she said. However, he never told anything that she said, as he appeared to have an aversion to mentioning the subject.

This, be it understood, was not Mrs. Cameron in the body, but her alter ego, her other self, her double, terms well understood by those familiar with occult matters. The man walked up to the new house just built by Mr. Cameron, and about to be occupied, and placing his hands, one on each side of his face, looked in a window. This house burned down something over twenty years ago.

From the Cameron place they went over quite a scope of territory unknown to Mr. Tarr, one place crossing Prairie Creek on a pole. People who heard Mr. Tarr's account of his ramble verified many peculiar things he spoke of seeing or of places he crossed streams, etc. After much wandering, at about three o'clock in the morning, they arrived at the home of a man named Deve Blue, who lived on a road now long disused, about a mile from his mother-in-law's place.

When they arrived at Blue's Mr. Tarr was wet to his waist with the dew on the grass and shrubs he had been traveling through, over logs, brush, etc., and was very tired, and no nearer home than when he had started hours before. He, like many others, then and now, swore when he felt so disposed, and he said that whenever he swore on his trip with the man, it became dark, but afterward got light again. He said he would go no further with the man, and would stop at Blue's. The man insisted that Mr. Tarr need not call up Mr. Blue, and that he should follow him.

Mr. Tarr, who was very tired and by this time pretty angry, called out Mr. Blue. Finding that Mr. Tarr would go no further with him, the man pulled the pin out that held the gate shut and handed it to Mr. Tarr and walked away. Mr. Blue came out, and though he could not tell why he did so, Mr. Tarr handed the gate pin to Mr. Blue, saying that as the man gave it to him, he would give it to Blue. Blue wanted to know what man, and Mr. Tarr started to tell him the story of his strange tramp, and pointed out the man, who was dodging in and out along the fence corners, but Blue could not see him at all, although they followed a little distance, Mr. Tarr continually pointing him out.

At last the man rose in the air, turned into a bright light, and passed to the west toward Georgetown (now Ney), and finally disappeared from view. Mr. Tarr did not think of the man being what we would term a materialized spirit, thought nothing whatever about who or what he was, till he turned into a light and disappeared in the sky. Then, as he expressed it, "every hair on his head seemed to stand on end."

Mr. Tarr went on then to the house of his mother-in-law, where he called them up, related his adventure, and went to bed. In the morning he went over to Ginter's (where they were rather anxious as to why he had not returned the night before, as they had staid up till midnight waiting for him, and had heard him call for Andrew Pierce), got his team and went home.

My mother says her father did not look the same to her after that, that it seemed to her as though, somehow, he had been hurt. It was afterward found that Andrew Pierce was in bed asleep when Mr. Tarr called for him, and if he answered the call, as the man said, and as something or somebody certainly did, it was his other self, his double, that did it.

On the morning of the 8th of June, 1848, Mr. Tarr hitched up his yoke of oxen to his wagon to go to a sawmill on the bank of Tiffin River, at Brunersburg, just beyond the dam where Hilton's grist mill stood for many years, to get some lumber to make a wagon-box for use in moving back to Crawford county. My mother says that when her father started from home that morning he turned and looked long and earnestly at each member of his family and drove away to his death, for in crossing the dam at Brunersburg, the boat he was crossing the river in was upset and he was drowned, at the early age of 28; truly, as the man had told him not ten days before, he only had "one more dam to cross!"

Immediately as the news of his death spread throughout the neighborhood, Mrs. Cameron said, prophetically, "there will be a death in every family he stopped at that night. How I wish that I could have talked with him before he died. Which one of our family must go?" Within two weeks her 15-year-old daughter died, and within six weeks death had claimed a daughter of Wm. Pierce, Jr., and a member each of the families of Deve Blue and John Ginter. Ginter sold out and went West, and I do not know where Blue went to.

Mr. Tarr was buried on the bank of Lick Creek, just east of the present town of Ney. A common theme of conversation connected with this strange but true story, is, if Mr. Tarr had followed the man on instead of leaving him at Blue's, would he have taken him to the spot where he was to be buried, and told him of his end, or not? The direction in which the man disappeared was the same as that from the same point, where the little graveyard was, where Mr. Tarr was buried.

From the description given of Mr. Tarr's ghostly guide, it was supposed that he was one James Crags, who died some years before that, and who had lived on the place where the graveyard was located. My grandmother told my grandfather that she thought he did wrong in not going with the man as far as he wished him to; and has since said that she had made him three shirts a few days before his death, but that all the time she was working at them it appeared to her to be useless to make them, that they would not be needed.

My mother says she thinks her father never wore any of the shirts. How great the premonition of the wife and mother! They all felt that something was going to happen; and strange as it may seem, the family slept peacefully and without fear on the night the husband and father had his thrilling ramble with a denizen of another world.

TRUE CONSOLATION.

Given by a Minister of the "Christian" Church.

To the Editor:—I do not go to church very often, but recently attended the funeral of a good old lady, the services being conducted by Elder Joseph Dutton, at the West Side Christian Church, this city.

The sermon throughout was in harmony with the facts and philosophy of Spiritualism.

The Elder is noted for the outspoken expression of his honest convictions, and in the course of his remarks said:

"It rejoices me to say to these sorrowing relatives and friends that this kind old mother is not in the casket that lies before us. She is not dead, but risen, and is more alive than ever before. Be of good cheer, it is only the material body that shall moulder back to dust, but in her spiritual body she has been met and greeted with songs of rejoicing by loved ones and conducted to a beautiful home in a higher plane of life, where she now mingles with her loving and beloved friends. Henceforth she will lovingly watch over you and wait patiently till one by one she will have welcomed you all to that glorious world of eternal progression where soul expansion in knowledge, love and truth are among the things that go to make up eternal happiness."

The whole sermon was given in a manner that greatly relieved and uplifted the sad ones from their load of gloom and sorrow.

A number of people shook hands with the Elder soon after the services were concluded, assuring him they had never before listened to so consoling a sermon at a funeral.

This aged clergyman, now 78, declares he will defend the truths of spirit communion.

Having preached over forty years, he is handy with his Bible, and in the past has debated with some able preachers on church doctrines, and the first "moss back" that pitches into him about his views on spiritual manifestations will get it right back. He is not orthodox any more; takes no stock in total depravity; does not believe the guilty can sail into heaven scot free on the merits of an innocent one. C. H. TOLER.

ILLEGAL.

Legacies to the Cause of Spiritualism.

It seems to be the natural disposition of humanity to hold on to their material wealth to the end of mortal life. This is all well enough, as a general rule, yet not justifiable in every instance. If a person of benevolent mind has property he desires to donate to benevolent enterprise, and abundance of wealth besides, it is the better way to give the amount while the donor is yet living in the physical form, for then the donor can have the satisfaction of seeing his desires and designs carried into effect, in whole or in part, and the mind will be at rest on that subject.

Spiritualists often get into trouble in the matter of legacies, and they have had enough object lessons in this line to teach them that they cannot legally will property to the cause of Spiritualism; or if they do so will it such wills will be defeated. The courts and laws of the land step in and say such wills are void. The leading cause of action, in such cases, is to show that the testator was insane—the proof of insanity being that he or she was a Spiritualist and willed his or her property to the cause of Spiritualism. It is much easier to prove a man insane after he is dead and buried, for then he can interpose no objection in the court that tries the case; and there is no trouble or expense of keeping the lunatic confined in an insane asylum.

There are many temptations and inducements to contest a will. Many interested parties want a slice of the estate—the court wants a part, the officers want fees, the lawyer wants a big fee, the heirs want the estate or what may be left of it after the expenses of litigation are all settled. All the interested parties for plaintiff generally get what they want; but the cause or enterprise or institution to which the property has been willed gets—nothing.

Some folks affirm that Spiritualism is not a religion, then turn right around and contend for equal rights and privileges with the popular religious denominations. We always have been opposed to unequal, unjust laws that give special privileges or exemptions to certain classes; therefore, it is inconsistent to demand the favors they confer.

The N. S. A. has made mistakes and placed Spiritualism in a false attitude before the world. Any argument that places us on a par or basis with the popular religious bodies is fallacious. As a distinct organic body, the N. S. A. may claim certain favors under the law for their own organization, but not in the name of Spiritualism, because it is not a distinctive movement. It is present among all sects, seeking to destroy distinctions and working for their overthrow, which has been often predicted; and from many historic events in the last half century, we have good reasons to hope the prophecy will be fulfilled.

All the old religious bodies stand in antagonism to Spiritualism; therefore it is not to be placed alongside of them, on a par, equal to and one of them, as the N. S. A. has been trying to do, to get the benefits of the civil law. This puts Spiritualism in a false position and sinks it to the level of superstition. It can never rank with religious denominations, for its demonstrated facts destroy the very basis of all church creeds. It says the creedal preaching of the whole sacerdotal world is false.

We do not say the laws are right nor just, but we do say that the decisions of courts and juries against Spiritualism are right, according to existing laws—especially where defendants in contested will cases make the plea that Spiritualism is a religion on equality with the old religious bodies. This plea is false, because it is not a religion as contemplated in the law; therefore not entitled to the benefits of the law. What we most need is the repeal of many bad laws—legal freedom from oppressive laws.

Those scribes who claim that Spiritualism is not a religion base their arguments on the old definitions and understanding of the word religion and their arguments are sound and true, and we are generally agreed on that point; while in the new definitions, by spirit teachers, we are not well agreed. Spiritualism is a religion in a sense which the world does not yet understand—a New Religion, in part, by new interpretations and definitions as expressed in the following synonyms and component parts; Truth; knowledge; goodness; love; spirituality; industry; progress; inspiration; freedom; fraternity; friendship; tolerance; liberty; equality; unity; harmony; peace; purity; happiness; morality; honesty; integrity—right living. These ideas and principles take religion out of its old province, in which it means, chiefly, service and worship of imaginary gods.

Spiritualism presents itself before the churches as a fair and honorable opponent—not an enemy with evil designs to do them harm. It comes as a friend, with pure motives, to do them good, to teach them the truth, to show them the errors in religious dogmas, to give them knowledge or prove to them that certain ideas they hold simply by faith and hope pertaining to a future life, are true—to demonstrate to them that communication with the spirit world is fact, that "if a man die he shall live again." It feeds the hungry souls with the bread of life, it has a message of hope for the weary and sorrowing ones, a message of warning to the oppressors.

Some writers have tried to limit and classify Spiritualism to some particular department of knowledge; but it will not stay confined anywhere—it persistently demands the utmost freedom and liberty.

Some individuals find fault with the word Spiritualism. Perhaps they would object to any other name as well. Can they suggest a better name? This name was chosen by the pioneer spirit guides, who understood perfectly what they were doing and what they wanted. The name is permanently established. It is the most comprehensive term we can think of. Even the gods, in its presence, can "go way back and sit down." It has independently proceeded to modify, rectify and purify every false condition, position, dogma, system throughout the world. As an educator, as a power for solace, as a moral incentive, as a reformatory impulse, it stands incomparable in its benefits to mankind. It gives to us a religion pure and simple, free and rational, beneficent and spiritual in its essence—a religion that is friendly to all, that gives us a high and holy hope, a beautiful, reasonable promise. The philosophy of Spiritualism is living truth, the light of eternal truth—it has come to stay and it stays, and not all the legions of fast-decaying religious systems can shake its foundations nor tear down the glorious superstructure.

My guide says Spiritualism is the knowledge, facts and principles that spirits and angels teach—the truth, the whole truth that spirits have taught. Can any one give a better definition in so few words? It has something to do with every province, sphere and phase of human life. It is a revelator, a teacher, a savior to save people from error, ignorance and superstition. Millions have been thus saved and millions more will follow. It teaches that people can save themselves—work out their own salvation—that each individual must be his or her own savior.

Spiritualism is a reformatory movement, a revelation from the spirit world, a history, a science, a philosophy, a religion, a savior—all these and more. A. H. NICHOLAS.

Topic: Universal Good.

Gem of Thought: "Bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you."

There is probably no admonition of the ancient times which the illumination of this age of new thought clarifies more than the above. The man of Galilee said, "To bless them that bless you, what reward have ye? Do not even the publicans and sinners so?" Doubtless this admonition did much for that age, but the thought of reward should not prompt human action.

As we discovered in our lesson a few weeks since, the harsh word or unholy thought affects the originator more than the one toward whom it is hurled; so the curse does not influence us as much as it does the curser.

And to return a blessing enables us to see distinctly the man and the deed, and to know that the ego is good and development is possible regardless of the surrounding conditions. Again, knowing that every soul is certain of growth to the superlative, we can but use each moment to assist in that growth.

No, not one moment can I hate,
Or curse, or fail to do
All within my way to create
Some good, my friend, for you.

For every soul is kin to me,
And good though filled with sin;
So I will help the blind to see
The light that shines within.

"Who giveth love to all; pays kindness for unkindness, smiles for frowns and lends new courage to each fainting heart, and strengthens hope and scatters joy abroad—he, too, is a redeemer, son of God."—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

Intermediate:

Leader.—Boys and girls, here we are with one of the important means of forming a desirable character.

Children.—How is that, seeing good in everything?

Leader.—Yes, that is what is meant by our topic, but I was referring to the Gem of Thought.

Children.—"Bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you."

Leader.—Yes. You remember we learned how the ball thrown against the house bounces back to us.

Children.—Yes, and that the same is true of thoughts and acts.

Leader.—Quite right. In the little acts of childhood's playtime you should begin to do right for its own sake, and to always do what will bring forth the good, better, best in you and in others. Don't think of what others have done or are doing, but do what to you seems right.

Children.—It is not easy to be kind to the unkind, and tender to the harsh.

Leader.—I see what you are thinking of—unwelcome nicknames and taunts and blows of playmates. Let me again remind you, "two wrongs don't make one right." You do the proper thing, and as far as you are concerned it is all right.

Topic: Universal Love.

Gem of Thought: "Bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you."

Little Ones:

A little boy wandering in the wood,
Picked up an ugly clump of dirt
Fastened to a stick, neither any good—
And with no thought to save or hurt
Carried it to his home.

With careless hand 'twas thrown aside
Into a corner, and left alone;
The boy passed by, his eyes were opened wide
For there a butterfly had grown
From that ugly clump of dirt.

Do not say the man is bad because you
Do not like his ways; let them pass
The pow'r of Love and Life is always true
And from our useless, ugly, corrupt mass
This power will bring some good.

The butterfly was in that ugly dress,
And though neglected came to light,
So pray do not curse if you cannot bless,
And this great law of good and right
Will bring the better best.

Talks to Spirit of Louiseau.

Red Star, chief, historian and medicine man of the Winnebago Indians, yesterday went out to the grave of his great-great-grandfather, Louiseau, at Grass Lake, to perform the traditional ancestral rites and to commune with his spirit.

He was laden with his book of records, the sacred pipe of peace and tobacco pouch, and wore gorgeous garments of wampum and eagles' feathers. The half-hundred business men and half as many choir-boys watched the sacrificing of the dog and the chanting of prayers to the dead warrior with silent interest.

But when Chief Red Star came back he was swamped by the tide of civilization. The imposing headdress was gone; the sacred pipe and pouch and the tribal tomahawk were gone; the necklace of bears' claws and strings of wampum were gone.

He had sold them an hour after the grave ceremony was ended. Even the beaded jacket of his youngest papoose was put up to the highest bidder.

For all that the rites were sincere, so far as Indian rites are, as a rule. The guests and Indian family that filled the coach provided for them by John P. Vidyard went out to perform a ceremony or to see one.

On a little mound within scent of the lotus beds of Grass Lake lies the dust of Louiseau, who, a century and a quarter ago, was the great warrior chieftain of the the Winnebago tribe. At this time of the year, his descendants believe, his spirit returns to the grave, and it is well for them to be there to request that room be made for them in the happy hunting-ground.

For this purpose Red Star, his squaw, Standing Before; his papooses, Black Cat, aged three, and Pleases Everybody, aged five, went to sacrifice a dog and to sprinkle tobacco about the grave. Prayers and incantations, war whoops and dancing were indulged in to call the spirit, and when finally the trail was struck they muttered their requests for future peace and believed the ancestral ghost went away satisfied.

A number of Chicago business men witnessed the ceremony.—Chicago American.

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. SPIRIT LIFE NOW.

A Letter from Frances E. Willard.

Dear Brothers and Sisters on the Physical Plane:—At the earnest request of many loving minds in your sphere I will suggest a few thoughts to the mind of this medium so that you may know that I have not deserted the earth-plane entirely. Indeed, this is a busy existence of mine at the present time, and one that my active nature revels in. I am happy to be a part and parcel in this great spiritual wave now sweeping over your land, and desire nothing better than to be able to manifest the truth of continued existence, the power of spirit to return and communicate with those incarnated in the flesh.

My sisters and brothers (for the time has come to put the sisters first and let the brothers follow), there is no greater blessing my life can bestow upon you than this knowledge which I have gained by experience, and I choose to do so under my own name, to fly my own flag, for I have not done anything of which I am ashamed, and it is my earnest desire to let the physical world know that the name of Frances E. Willard stands for freedom in every sense of the word. I freely and unequivocally advocate freedom for men, women and children, as strong, or even stronger, as our brother Robert Ingersoll ever dared to.

And now the question arises in my mind: Why will you enslave your selves? By custom and by habit you follow erroneous teachings appertaining to every plane of life. Alas! I know too well what it is to be afraid to claim our heritage of freedom; and the greatest bugbear humanity has to contend with is public opinion, and one of the first lessons it needs to learn is its fallibility, and seek to be released from its baneful enthrallment, and realize that one's own self is the first necessity of every life.

Self-knowledge is the road to power, because it leads man into the channels of universal law. What I wish to say now is best quoted from B. F. Austin's Methods and Maxims of Thought Power: "When a man learns himself he has learned that he cannot live to and by himself, but must come into harmonious relationship with his fellows and with natural law. He sees himself related to all the universe, and as each atom serves a universal end, so he must learn to live for the universal good. No selfish person ever reached the highest success. Broad aims, noble altruistic purposes and earnestness of spirit, bring a man into touch with all nature and cause streams of power to flow in upon his being from the four quarters of heaven.

"1. Every soul should realize the pregnant truth that the greatest talent, power and possibility ever manifested in the greatest life recorded on history's pages lies awaiting development within himself. The difference between the weakest life and the strongest, between the most successful life and the greatest life failure, is largely the difference between awakened and dormant thought forces and powers of the soul. Man's first effort must be, therefore, the awakening of himself. As the outer life is but an expression of the inner thought and spirit forces he must first set up the kingdom within. This setting up of the kingdom is the liberation, direction and use of the mighty forces of your own being in thought, desire and will. Just as men liberate the forces of heat, steam and electricity, and direct them to useful ends, so man must learn to free and utilize the greater powers within the soul.

"These forces must be used for constructive, not destructive purposes, for universal good and not for mere selfish aims.

"2. Every soul must destroy its belief in its own limitations, expel its fears, banish its doubts and cultivate the mood of success. It is infinitely more important you should have faith in yourself than that all the world should have faith in you.

"You must form the mental mood of success and make it permanent.

"This permanent mood involving hope, faith, trust, desire and cheer will set magnetic currents vibrating which will, in time, affect the environment of your life.

"Mightier are these vibrating currents generated by thought force under right moods and conditions that all bodily activity without them.

"3. Cease all wasteful and injurious expenditures of thought power—such as hate, worry and anxiety. These weaken and poison the nature.

"4. Cultivate the love element of your being. It is a magnetic force which will increase the soul's power and enrich your life with untold good. It is the soul's native atmosphere and sunshine. Love organizes and harmonizes the soul powers and calls them into constant exercise, leading to happiness as a natural and inevitable result.

"5. Remember the time to be happy is now, the place here, and the duty and privilege belong to every soul.

"6. Remember that nature's evident intention is the happiness of each soul and the success of each life. You have, therefore, a divine right to happiness and success. Claim your heritage.

"7. The one thing to be conquered is ignorance. Cultivate an insatiable desire to know, especially to know all about yourself. As you grow in knowledge you grow toward omnipotence. Explore every part of your nature and find and remove every sham and falsity of your being, for nothing is permanent and powerful and successful that is not true and good.

"8. Remember that occult powers are born of calmness and repose. Keep, therefore, your inner nature unperturbed. From this calm center of reposeful power within you send forth the mighty forces of thought and desire which shall work your sovereign will.

"9. High ideals are necessary to greatest success. Form, therefore, the highest possible ideals of what you would have your body, your home, your business, your influence, your friends, your entire environment become. Live as far as practicable, this ideal life. Your thoughts by constant cherishing of lofty ideals will form the molds into which all the environments of your life will naturally shape themselves as molten metal takes shape from its surroundings."

Our thanks are due Brother Austin for this valuable lesson, and we hope he will pardon our taking bodily possession of it to present to a large class of our own, who otherwise would not have had its valuable teaching.

In Defense of Spiritualism.

To the Editor:—I enclose an article which I took from the Free Thought Magazine. This article appeared in the February number of the present year.

In this article, the writer, Eliza Mowry Bliven, says: "I think the advocates of anarchy, communism, hypnotism, Spiritualism, free love and liquor saloons are misleaders of the people, and promoters of immorality and harm, much worse than the errors of supernaturalism taught by the churches."

This rank insult to every honorable Spiritualist in the country grated upon my conscience so much, that I answered her attack, and sent it to the Free Thought Magazine, but although I especially requested that it be published, that both sides might have a hearing, they stubbornly refused to do so.

I haven't a copy of my reply, but in it, I said: "But Sister Bliven makes no exceptions: 'All Spiritualists are promoters of immorality and harm,' to, say nothing of this insult to hypnotism, which latter is doing more good in a single day than Sister Bliven is doing in a lifetime."

I then asked "if Longfellow was a Spiritualist?" Listen to a verse of one of his poems, dear sister:

"Then the forms of the departed
Enter at the open door;
The beloved, the true-hearted
Come to visit me once more.'

"Is this verse productive of immorality and harm, Sister Bliven?

"Is Ella Wheeler Wilcox a Spiritualist? Listen again, dear Sister:

"'Love thyself last. The vastness above thee,
Is filled with spirit forces strong and pure;
And fervently these faithful friends shall love thee,
As never yet to selfish souls was given.
Whate'er thy lot, a perfect peace shall fill thee,
And earth shall seem the ante-room of heaven.'"

Perhaps, after reading this, Sister Bliven would nail Mrs. Wilcox as a free lover, also. Who can tell?

I closed my article with the following statement:

"But Ella Wheeler Wilcox is no better than the anarchists, and the liquor saloon should be Longfellow's home, 'for all are promoters of immorality and harm, much worse than the errors of supernaturalism, taught by the churches."

The editor of the Free Thought Magazine evidently ignored the right of free speech, for the sake of keeping a friend. Although he is fighting for free speech and free press, he at the same time, has refused me a hearing in his so-called Free Thought Magazine.

Yours for fair play,
A. C. FISHER.

WHY BE SICK?

Dr. J. M. Peebles, the Famous Physician and Scientist Has Perfected a System of Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Sufferer.

Read His Valuable Book, "A Message of Hope"—It will Explain to You This Wonderful Treatment and Tell You How You Can be Healed.

Why will you continue to suffer when there is a treatment at hand that will cure you? Dr. Peebles and his associates, all physicians of wide experience and reputation, have perfected a system of treatment that promises health and strength to all.

J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D.

Many of their cures seem almost like miracles, for hundreds of those restored have traveled far and wide, trying this doctor and that, without getting any relief and were about to give up in despair when they began the treatment of Dr. Peebles.

They are able to do such wonderful cures because they work in harmony with nature, and employ her mighty healing forces in connection with mild, scientifically prepared medicinal remedies. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the depleted system, enriches the blood, improves digestion and assimilation, gives strength and tone to weakened nerves and muscles, and permanently repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing thousands of the sick to rejoice at being healed.

Why don't you sit down, at once, and write the doctors a plain, truthful letter as to your condition as you see it? If you will do this, they will carefully examine your case and send you a full diagnosis of your condition, and tell you truthfully whether or not they can cure you. This will cost you nothing, and if they find they can cure you, they will make their charges so small that anyone can afford the treatment.

If you are sick, write them at once for their full diagnosis and professional advice which will be sent without charge, together with their wonderful book, "A Message of Hope," which will explain fully this grand system of treatment and give you information that will brighten the remainder of your life. Epilepsy Cured,

At Last a Positive and Permanent Cure for This Terrible Maladay Is Discovered.

The renowned Brain and Nerve Specialist, Dr. Charles W. Green, of Battle Creek, Mich., has at last found a positive cure for Epilepsy, or Fits.

Epilepsy has baffled the medical world since the time of Hippocrates, and not until the Eminent Specialist, Dr. Green, patiently worked out his great cure has a positive cure for Epilepsy been known. The Doctor has used it in every case of fits he has treated in the past five years, hundreds of whom had tried everything they could hear of before taking his treatment, and he has yet to find the case, not due to injury, that it will not cure.

Mrs. Lizzie Green, of Boston, says: I cannot thank you enough for my deliverance from that terrible disease, Epilepsy. I had suffered with it for thirty years and had tried everything I could hear of, but the attacks only grew harder and more frequent. I had given up all hope when one of my neighbors told me of your great cure. I should not have written this if she had not urged me, for I had been fooled so often that I had resolved to pay out no more money. God bless her for urging me for you cured me and saved me from a life worse than death." Do not experiment longer with "Free Cures" and worthless nostrums containing injurious hypnotics, etc., but write at once to Dr. Charles W. Green, 214 Monroe St., Battle Creek, Mich., for full particulars of this great and tried remedy. It will cure you and brighten the end of your life. Write at once giving full facts about your case; the doctor will tell you exactly what can be done for you. Remember the treatment is positively guaranteed.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

HEALING, Causes and Effects, By W. P. Phelon, M. D. Deals with the finer mental and spiritual forces as applied to healing. Price, 50 cents.

"NO BEGINNING."

An Excellent Work for Thinkers.

This book, "No Beginning," is by William H. Maple. The Arena says of it: "The argument is unanswerable. The book will at once appeal to the reason of every reader, and leave him more amazed than ever at the prevalence of the theory of Creation." The Two has always been a fateful number. Free Thought Ideal says: "We found it full of glittering thoughts for thinkers, and the very death warrant of Christian superstition shines upon its pages." Price 75 cents.

PROGRESSION Or How a Spirit Advances in Spirit Life. The evolution of Man. By Michael Faraday. Price. 15c.

THE SOUL OF THINGS;

Or Psychometric Researches and Discoveries. By Wm. and Elizabeth M. F. Denton. A marvelous work. Though concise as a text book it is as fascinating as a work of fiction. The reader will be amazed to see the curious facts here combined in support of this power of the human mind, which will resolve a thousand doubts and difficulties, make geology plain as day, and throw light on all subjects now obscured by time. KNOWLEDGE.

Law of Clairvoyance, Clairaudience and Psychometry.

How do we know things and events? By becoming conscious of their existence. When we see a chair standing at a certain place, we know that there is a thing called a chair standing before our eyes, because we see it. Our eye perceives the thing by being affected by its vibrations which act upon our eye-nerves; thus the impression of the eye-nerve becomes consciousness and we know that there is a chair.

The perception of material things is carried on by our material senses and the consciousness of material things is material knowledge. But events which we cannot see, hear, feel, smell or taste by our human senses convey to us a knowledge far greater than the material consciousness of material things. They are made known to us by the psychometric or soul sense.

Clairvoyance, for instance, meaning clear sight, unobstructed by material things, or seeing clear through material things, is a knowledge established by a sense which has nothing in common with the eyes at all; contrarily, the clairvoyant usually closes the eyes to better establish the clairvoyant sight or clairvoyant perception of things and events which cannot come through the human senses to our consciousness or the consciousness of the clairvoyant.

The X-ray machine is a practical demonstration of clairvoyance, for through it even the material eye is enabled to see clear through material things.

Now how does a clairvoyant know that such and such a thing or being is present?

To make it clear to all readers, let me call the presence manifesting to the clairvoyant, a spirit; then how does the clairvoyant know that such and such a spirit is present?

The objective world or nature is the expression of the subjective world or spirit sphere. Nature is the non-molecular ether transformed into molecular ether, from molecular ether into atoms, and the atoms grouped together according to the law of co-ordination form the objective life or objective expression of the subjective or etheric world. In this way the unseen is made seen, the non-perceptible by the human senses is made perceptible to them. But since what we hear, see, taste, smell and feel with our human senses is only the product of an etheric world which is non-perceptible to those physical senses, there must be a knowledge which is beyond the knowledge established or coming to us through the human senses. A knowledge of the etheric, or thought-man, the inner man, spirit or soul of the outer or physical man. The knowledge coming to us through clairvoyance, clairaudience and psychometry proves this to be a fact. Psychometry combines the sense of the nose, touch and taste, for the psychometric medium often smells or feels the presence of a spirit or has a peculiar taste in his mouth by which a spirit presence wants to be recognized by parties in the audience. That peculiar sensation of taste is given to the medium by the spirit presence as a peculiarity by which the spirit can most easily be recognized. Thus the duality of our five senses is proven beyond a doubt to any earnest investigator.

Now how does the medium know that a certain spirit is present and wants to communicate with someone in the audience or anywhere else?

The answer to this question is: By correlative etheric vibrations, created by the spirit and so affecting the corpus striatum of the medium that unconsciousness is established therein to the medium.

There is a certain nerve, only lately discovered by a German scientist, which connects the medulla oblongata with the corpus striatum. Of this nerve so far no scientist knew its purpose or utility. Yes, science was at a total loss as to its working or why it existed.

It is this nerve upon which the spirit can work and thus make its presence perceptible to the medium; and if it can be fully controlled by a spirit, then the medium is totally unconscious of all surroundings and events going on in his or her presence. The seat of consciousness, the corpus striatum, is severed from the center of all nerves, the medulla oblongata, and thus the medium is absolutely unaware of all and everything; he can neither hear, see, feel, taste nor smell anything. No sensation whatever can pass from the medulla oblongata to the corpus striatum and the medium acts as an entirely different person than when in the normal state.

I claim that seventy-five per cent of the inmates of the insane asylums are in that condition.

If this state is allowed to take place by the medium's free will, directed by higher spiritual powers, then the connection with the higher spiritual world is established and higher truths will be communicated to mankind for the benefit of mankind, for the uplifting of the human race. This truth is demonstrated on the Spiritualistic platforms, particularly in their camp-meetings where the best of trance speakers are demonstrating it through their physical organism.

This knowledge from the etheric sphere, however, does not require full control of the human senses or the disconnection of the corpus striatum from the medulla oblongata in the human brain to make itself perceptible to the medium, but it can make itself perceptible to the clairvoyant, clairaudient and psychometric medium in part only, and restricted according to the law of co-ordination and co-relation. That is, if the vibratory waves of the spirit presence are sympathetic with the thoughts, life and surroundings of the medium, then the medium will be able to perceive or become conscious of just as much of it as does co-relate or is in sympathy with the medium's views.

It further does not require a regular medium at all to make itself perceptible to anyone; for we all have sympathetic feelings, likes and dislikes, dreams, so-called, and visions; impressions and notions.

If it comes from the higher spheres we call it "intuition." If it comes from the uneducated, ignorant and malicious intelligences we call it a lie, a theft, stupidness, malice, ignorance, etc. And if the intelligence is able to have full dominion over the nerve center of the person through whom it manifests, that is, if the intelligence can sever the medulla oblongata or disconnect it from the corpus striatum, then we call it "Insanity." For all etheric life has the power to affect that nerve connecting the medulla oblongata with the corpus striatum, the seat of consciousness. So mediumship is voluntary insanity and insanity is unvoluntary mediumship.

Both manifestations are knowledge acting under and by virtue of the law of co-ordination in the vibratory etheric sphere. A highly educated person with the desire of knowledge from the higher spheres will attract higher spiritual powers, the medium which uses this knowledge for material gain only, will attract a selfish class of intelligences; the healer who has the welfare of mankind at heart, will attract the healing powers and perform so-called wonderful cures, and so everybody receives just what he or she asks for, according to the law of like attracts like. Thus St. Mathew vii: 7, 8 is proven to be a truth.

I heard a good illustration of this from an investigator a few days ago. He is a wealthy tanner; told me that he was lying on his couch one evening without light in the room and saw a figure of six ciphers appear before him whilst he was figuring out how much he would have earned when New Year would come around. He was not asleep, but rubbed his eyes and still saw the figures. He put that figure down in his little pocket almanac, and on the tenth of January, when the inventory was completed, it proved that his earnings during those six months had been over a million dollars—a few dollars more than the figure shown to him in his vision, by spirits, attracted by his figuring out his prospective profits. By the same law the insane and afflicted are cured; we all receive what we ask for, the knowledge which co-ordinates with our unfoldment.

WHAT IT IS DOING.

"Facing the Twentieth Century."

The following was written November 10, 1899, and published in The Tribune, of New Philadelphia, Ohio. It is of special interest:

To the Editor:—Through the courtesy of a clerical friend, I have been privileged to read a recent interesting publication entitled "Facing the Twentieth Century," by Rev. James M. King, D. D., of New York. It is a comprehensive volume of 640 pages and treats of one of the most vital questions which confronts the people of the United States at the close of the 19th century.

The assaults upon the American public school system by one of the religious denominations have been so flagrant and persistent for many years past that public sentiment was thoroughly aroused, and resulted, December 24, 1889, in the incorporation by the legislature of New York of the National League for the Protection of American Institutions, of which the author of the book, Rev. James M. King, D. D., of the M. E. church, was general secretary and one of the active promoters. Its main object, as tersely expressed, was "To provide a safeguard against very grave existing abuses, and yet graver possible dangers."

The affiliation of church and state is most explicitly condemned in this book, as it ought to be. It may not be generally known or heeded that for many years past the Congress of the United States, in flagrant violation of the federal constitution, has made extravagant appropriations of public monies for sectarian religious uses. This became so offensively notorious that Senator John Sherman, as far back as June 25, 1890, presented a petition from a number of citizens of Dayton, Ohio, who besought his earnest opposition to appropriations for sectarian purposes. The petition recited the fact that in the year 1889 there was given to Roman Catholics, for Indian education, $356,000. They demanded from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs $44,000 more, making a total of over $400,000. The commissioner refused and announced in June 1891, that he would not extend the contract system. An effort was made to defeat his confirmation by the Senate, which happily failed. "It should be remembered," said the petitioners, "that in 1880 the amount of money secured from the government by the Roman Catholics was $184,000, and in 1890 it had reached the large sum of $356,000. Is it not time that this perversion of public money to sectarian uses should cease?"

The foregoing facts and figures were given by the writer of this article in one of our county papers at that time, but elicited little or no attention. The timely appearance of this book, by Rev. James M. King, D. D., one of the prominent M. E. clergymen in the state of New York, will again direct public attention to this vitally imporant matter. It may be instructive here to note, says Rev. King, "That seven great Protestant denominations, by the action of their highest executive councils, indorsed the principles advocated and the work undertaken by the National League, which constitutes by adherence of not less than one-third of the entire population of the United States."

As a sample of the earnest work of the League, it may be mentioned that in June, 1894, it presented to the New York state constitutional convention the petitions of about 40,000 citizens of standing and reputation, and the expressed convictions of not less than three millions of the population of the Empire state reached the convention in authoritative form. The result was a most decisive victory for the principles advocated by the League. The result of the agitation by the League was that early in the year 1896, all the denominations but one to which it had appealed in 1890, had withdrawn from the receipt of government appropriations for educational work among the Indians.

"The result has been that in consequence of the withdrawal of religious bodies, and by the action of Congress, the appropriations for such schools have been reduced from $611,570 in 1892 to $212,954 in 1898."

To sum up this important matter, it is gratifying to state that Congress has declared emphatically that it is the policy of the government of the United States to make no appropriation of money or property for the purpose of founding, maintaining or aiding any religious denomination, which is under sectarian or ecclesiastical control. This from and after June 30, 1898.

"These great results during the past ten years," says the book, "are concededly due to the movement of which the National League is the acknowledged leader, and largely the outcome of the League's active work in Congress and in the individual states."

"No principle is better understood and more firmly established in the judgment of intelligent countrymen than the true relation between the education of the American children and the future of the American republic."

This article is in no sense an advertisement of this valuable contribution to American literature, but a free-will offering to a patriotic citizen, who will find his chief reward in the approbation of his fellow-countrymen and a realization of duty faithfully and ably performed. C. H. MATHEWS.

A LESSON OF HISTORY.

Spiritual Manifestations Among the Shakers, During 1837 to 1847.

I was pleased with the answer to my question as to the spirit manifestations among the Shakers in 1837 and for some years thereafter, although on one point the writer, Mr. Tuttle or his controlling intelligences, were not quite correct.

The Shakers did not "hide their light under a bushel," but for a long time after the commencement of those spirit manifestations, which occurred from 1837 to 1847, and of which the writer was an eye witness, the outside public from every surrounding section were admitted to our meetings, witnessing all phases of the same as freely as did ourselves, without the least holding back on our part.

I cannot say just how long the meetings were kept open to outsiders, but after a time their ridicule and insolent conduct in many ways became of such a disturbing kind as to be quite unbearable, and then it was that our leaders decided the best course to take was to close our public meetings, so that we could enjoy these heavenly ministrations in peace. Our leaders said the masses were not ready for such a work, and better not "cast pearls before swine."

Our house of worship was private property, as much so as our culinary and laundry departments, and therefore no one could dispute our right to close the doors against an outside rabble not fit to be admitted to any decent assemblage, either public or private.

Sometimes there would be present 200 spectators, taking up nearly one-third of our room, and many of them behaved so ridiculously that they were often requested to leave the house, which for the time being would seem to put a slight check upon those remaining.

But, had the Shakers at that time been as ready to submit to a little outside derisive insolence, as were Mother Ann Lee and her immediate co-workers to suffer the most shameful and inhuman persecution from the unbelieving crowds, keeping their doors open and continuing to shed the light abroad, laying aside their dogmatic doctrines, progressing with the times, they might truly have claimed a very great share (and possibly the leadership in these modern times) in the work of enlightening the then dark and benighted masses as to the continued life beyond the grave, and also the possibilities of spirit return, and communication between this and the other side of life.

I believe that Mother Ann was a chosen instrument of the spirit world to bring about a great work on earth in the line of spirituality—peace, purity, universal brotherhood, truth, love, justice, charity, and every other ennobling qualification of character that can be named. I never learned that she promulgated personally any dogmatic doctrines. She claimed to be led by the Christ spirit, and that through her instrumentality was his spirit made manifest a second time on earth—a new dispensation to be ushered in—the kingdom of heaven established right here in this mundane sphere.

In her day all those gifts which were realized by the early disciples were in full exercise among the early converts to her doctrines. They saw and communed with angel beings, talked in tongues, laid their hands upon the sick and healed them.

I lived with many in my youth who had been conversant with Mother Ann, and they said she was the purest, most elevated, angelic character they had ever known. She taught the converts in their own homes, counseling them in all ways to strive for the highest attainments of life—the spiritual and intellectual. Yes, she taught true Spiritualism, both by precept and example, and all her true followers preach and practice the same.

Mother Ann had a mission to perform, which she fully and faithfully accomplished, then went to her reward in the heavens. She said it was not her mission to call the people from their individual, domestic relationships, into the communal homes, but would be the work of those who came after her, which proved to be the case.

She was the would-be emancipator of woman-kind, and taught their equal rights with their brother man—the sexes to live together in harmony, neither one nor the other to assume precedence, but walk and work side by side in peace and purity of purpose.

She passed on while yet in middle life. Had she survived to the usual age allotted to man, and continued to follow out her own personal convictions (as she did while here) I believe her people would have been led into broader and more progressive channels of thought and action than was the case when I was young. I am not cognizant of their present status of life, either physically, mentally or spiritually.

J. H. JOHNSON.

This correspondent as an eye witness of the manifestations, has contributed valuable matter to the early history of Modern Spiritualism. She, however, proves the correctness of the statement made in the answer, that the Shakers "hid their light under a bushel." They set out to give it free to all comers, but met with such rebuff that the leaders decided to close the public meetings for "the masses were not ready for such a work and it was better not to cast pearls before swine." They kept it to their little community and its high tide passed into ebb. What more could be said to prove that the great opportunity was lost! And more, they espoused it not as the universal knowledge of life here and hereafter, but as an ally of religion, and of the narrow phase of their ideas of religion. Spiritualism must be the exponent of Shakerism, and no more.

Had they received it in full measure, this correspondent is right in her conclusion that the Shakers would have led in the great spiritual movement of modern times. But had they done so, they would have been swept from their moorings and soon ceased to be Shakers. They preferred to remain; to conceal the light in the narrow walls of their community, and Spiritualism found other channels less obstructed. Shakerism having no vital force to sustain it, was left to perish.

The existence of the Shaker Society depended on the very sin or evil, to guard against which the members were drawn together. Marriage and offspring were deplorable evidences of a fallen nature, and hence as the society could not be enlarged by the children of its members, it could only increase by the sins of those outside. Spiritualism is antagonistic to this doctrine.

The most sacred relation in this world is that of husband and wife. It is according to the laws of nature, of human organization, and as pure as praiseworthy. The children of such union of intelligence and love, are not "begotten in sin," but are divine as the Christ born in a manger in Palestine. Parentage has immeasurable responsibilities, for the Shakers' contention is true of unwanted children, born in strife and antagonism. For one may be started from the initial germ hell-ward as another heaven-ward. Not, however, to command asceticism, as with the Shakers, as a remedy for the license of animality, but the firm restraint, and direction of the passions essential to earthly life, by the domination of the higher spiritual faculties.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Critical Thoughts—God.

The Bible presents to mankind a personal God, in whom all church people and many others believe implicitly. In fact they have an idea that to doubt the existence of God would be a sin most unpardonable. They tell us so much about God's love, justice and mercy that we feel inclined to ask them if they have ever read the Old Testament.

But granting that there may be just such a God as they tell us about; if there be, he surely misses many fine opportunities to display his wonderful power, love and mercy in aid of his faithful children. In fact, it is so seldom that God exhibits himself in a real, practical business-like sort of a way, that some folks are about ready to doubt if there be such a God at all. It is rather common at the present time not to depend on God for help in all cases of emergency.

It is said that man is weak, sinful and degraded; hardly worthy to draw the breath of life; that he loves darkness rather than light because his deeds are evil." Yet when help becomes indispensable we look to man, who generally responds with all the power that is in him. He does not need to be begged or persuaded.

If the weak and helpless should sink down and perish while we are calling on God for aid we still say that God is good and merciful, but if man should refuse to give assistance when he might give it the whole world would condemn him and say he had not a spark of mercy in him.

BLOTS ON CIVILIZATION.

A Terrible Indictment of Our Industrial System.

Can it be gainsaid that the vital interests of humanity in this mortal career are of as serious import, and if set aside or neglected must hinder spiritual progress quite as effectually as will the neglect of correct information in regard to a future state beyond the veil?

If we do not push our endeavors in the direction of a wise, just and harmonious condition here and now, and so co-work with the exalted beings whom we believe are ministering to human needs, are we fitting ourselves to enter the realms of the spirits of the just made perfect?

Spiritualists do not believe in human slavery. Are we as a people aware that the most hideous form of slavery ever disgracing a so-called civilized people is now thriving in our country? Do the great body of Spiritualists know that tens of thousands of children under the age of twelve and tens of thousands more under the age of fourteen are treading the hard path of daily toil ten and twelve hours?

Children, in our capitalistic system of "profit"-seeking as the paramount, all-engrossing consideration in "business," are deprived of all natural and needful opportunity for physical and mental normal growth, health and strength.

From the state of Wm. Lloyd Garrison and Bunker Hill textile manufacturers have removed to South Carolina where there are no laws regulating child labor, and where they were assured no such laws should be enacted. The report of Elbert Hubbard, who investigated recently the cotton mills of South Carolina, reveals a far more horrible and menacing form of slavery than the chattel negro slavery for which we so dearly paid in lives and treasure.

He writes: "Boys and girls from the age of six years and upwards are employed. They usually work from six o'clock in the morning until seven at night. At noon I saw them squat on the floor and devour their food which consisted mostly of corn bread and bacon. These wenzened pigmies munched in silence, and then toppled over in sleep on the floor in all the abandon of babyhood. When it came time to go to work the foreman marched through the groups, shaking the sleepers, shouting in their ears, lifting them to their feet and in a few instances kicking the delinquents into wakefulness.

"These toddlers, I saw for the most part did but one thing—they watched the flying spindles on a frame twenty feet long and tied the broken threads. They could not sit at their tasks; back and forth they paced, watching with inanimate, dull look, the flying spindles.

"I learned from a reliable source that a cotton mill having a pay roll of six thousand dollars a week in New England, can be run in the South for four thousand dollars a week. This means a saving of just one hundred thousand dollars a year; and the mill having a capital of one million dollars thus gets a clear gain of ten per cent per annum."

And the capitalists who were not born and bred where slavery was an inherited institution, as were the slave owners of the South, are ready to enslave helpless childhood to gain a larger per cent on their investment. Are not our people in need of a new "business" conscience?

In Georgia and Alabama efforts are being made to secure legislation restricting child labor. The state convention of the Democratic party in South Carolina on May 21, 1902, adopted the following resolution by a vote of more than two-thirds of its membership:

"Resolved by the Democratic party of South Carolina in convention assembled, that it is the sense of this convention that the General Assembly of this state should and ought to pass an appropriate law prohibiting the employment of children under twelve in the manufacturing establishments of the state."

But not alone in the South is the child a victim to heartless greed and the despotism of "profit" seeking.

Prof. Felix Adler declares conditions in New York are "worse than in the South." Child labor is on the increase in Philadelphia.

The laws are not enforced in states where restrictions exist. And this trespass upon the helpless child should receive the vigorous protest of the public.

The factory inspectors' report of the state of Illinois indicates the very humanizing environment of boys employed in the stock yards.

"Some of these boys act as butchers, sticking sheep and lambs and swine, others cut the hide from the quivering flesh of freshly stunned cattle, and others sort entrails, pack meat and make the tin cans in which the goods are shipped. In several places a boy has been found at work at a dangerous machine. Because his father had been disabled by it and his keeping the place pending recovery depended upon the boy's doing the work during the father's absence."

Mr. A. M. Simons says: "I believe that Chicago manufactures more picture frames than any other city in the country—probably in the world. They are largely produced by child labor, hundreds of children, ranging from eleven or twelve years to sixteen, working ten hours a day under horrible and indescribable conditions!"

And another thing we might wisely consider is, to what extent are good people at fault for these perilous and cruel conditions of childhood because in every way making "cheapness" necessary to the success of the dealer.

Space cannot be given to enumerate the many cruel conditions that are shortening the lives of many of these innocent victims of a conscienceless economic and commercial system, and still more fatal to the future of our civilization, causing the physical and moral degeneracy of those who survive.

The real greatness and perpetuation of a people and a civilization cannot be achieved by army and navy, neither by great accumulations in treasury or a world-expanded trade and market, but only by the production of great and robust manhood and womanhood, and for this the foundation must be the healthy, normally unfolded child.

Destruction and deterioration of childhood by wearisome protracted toil, robbing the early child life of the physical development of play, and the care-free season so important to normal maturing; despoiling helplessness for "profit" making is the monumental climax of robbery. It is the most destructive, as it is the most horrible slavery the history of civilization has recorded, or the correct estimate of today is compelled to announce. Can our country men and women allow this enormity to proceed?

Is there not in our land enough love-quickened conscience to arrest and remove this infamy? Or will we allow the monster greed to destroy the very root of our national life, a healthy, vigorous, well-endowed, well-environed, well educated child?

All who are really Spiritualists (not merely phenomena seekers) must understand that the true progress of humanity and peoples, consists not in abundance of possessions, nor intellectual attainments, valuable as these are, but in the unfoldment and growth of spiritual powers and integrity of character.

In the light of higher ideals of human destiny and progress, of individual and collective responsibilities and devotion to the right, every child born in a so-styled civilized community should be secured in the rightful inheritance of opportunity of development of body, mind and soul.

Spiritualism ought to make it possible for a spiritual education here and now. The hindrances in our warring, unjust, robbing systems of production and distribution it is quite as important to remove as the errors of old theology, eternal damnation and vicarious atonement. LUCINDA B. CHANDLER.

MY MOTHER'S SPIRIT HOME.—A VISION

As I sit in deep dream
I catch a faint gleam
Of the light of a beautiful day,
And I see the bright face
Of my mother, and trace
Her dear tired feet o'er the way.

I follow her tread
Through the land of the dead
To the bright land of spirit on high;
I can scarcely keep pace
With her feet in this place,
Though ever so hopeful I try.

As I know not the laws,
My mother must pause
To help my weak spirit ascend;
But a look from her eyes
And quickly I rise,
Such force can her spirit extend.

We pass through great halls
And out over walls,
And over green meadow and vale,
All rich with perfume
Of flowers in bloom,
Together in spirit we sail.

To her I oft turn
With the voice of a yearn,
And I ask for a view of the dead,
Whom I had been told
Were at the threshold
Awaiting the sound of my tread.

* * * * * * * *

Just then, as by chance,
I happened to glance
Toward a light that seemed moving about,
When forth from the air
All blooming and fair,
Came father and brothers and sisters, with shout.

So quickly they came,
All shouting my name,
I clung to my mother in fear,
Till she called out the roll
Of each kindred soul,
Who drew most lovingly near.

And, oh, how sublime
That soul-greeting time,
'Twas richer than cold words can tell,
There under the dome
Of mother's soul home,
Where all of my soul-kindred dwell.

* * * * * * * *

Then under her care
We all enter there,
And oh, for right words to portray
The beauty and grace
Of that holy place
Where mother's dear spirit holds sway.

There hang on the wall
Bright pictures of all,
E'en those who paused not in their birth,
Are grouped with the few
Now journeying through
The highways and by-ways of earth.

Birds and sweet flowers
And heavenly bowers,
And music's sweet echoing sound
Are parts of the home,
That beautiful home,
Where mother as queen has been crowned.

Oh, beautiful home!
Oh, heavenly home!
Sweet home where my mother is queen.
In soul-land above,
Adorned with her love,
With not e'en a veil in between.

HEART VS. THEOLOGY.

Humanity Triumphant Over "Hell and Damnation."

It has in past time been a mooted puzzle, among those of orthodox belief, what to do with the babies dying in infancy. As babies and all fell in Adam's fall, and inherit from him a sinful and depraved nature, how could they be saved without faith in Christ? and being babies, how could they believe?

Calvinism, by its phrase "elect infants" most assuredly implied non-elect infants, and these, according to Calvinistic theology, will be eternally damned.

The so-called Calvinistic theology of to-day is greatly modified and mollified, and differs essentially from the Calvinism of John Calvin, the Westminster Confession and Jonathan Edwards. The time is past when the "sweet singers" and hymn-writers, even of the greatest apparent sticklers for Calvinism, can write and sing such theology as this:

—"hell is crammed with infants damned,
Without a day of grace."

"There is a never-ending hell,
And never-dying pains,
Where children must with devils dwell
In darkness, fire and chains."

No so-called Calvinist of to-day could be hired to say, as John Calvin said:

"Children bring their condemnation with them from their mother's womb, being liable to punishment, not for the sin of another, but for their own; for, although they have not yet produced the fruits of their iniquity, they have the seed inclosed in themselves; nay, their whole nature is, as it were, a seed of sin; therefore it cannot but be odious and abominable to God."

This is the Calvinism of John Calvin, and was formerly preached by Presbyterians and Calvinistic Baptists—even in the ears of some people who are yet living. And the standard Calvinistic textbooks of theology taught it.

The writer of these lines was a teacher of a Sunday-School class—years ago. Among other children were two lovely little boys, brothers, bright, innocent, confiding. The lesson brought up the subject of sin and punishment. The little fellows, having been taught at home and Sunday-School about "hell and damnation," according to the regulation orthodox views—took the subject out of my hands—telling how, if they were bad they would go to the "bad place" into fire and brimstone, etc. I was then passing from orthodoxy to Unitarianism—not yet ready for Spiritualism. The little fellows' talk was too much for me—O, it was so horrible! that the "little ones" of whom Jesus said, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven," should have their tender minds filled with such terrible ideas!

That little episode sped me on my way from Methodism, through Universalism and Unitarianism to Spiritualism, leaving the damnable damnation doctrines behind me, as things utterly abhorrent and morally abominable, no matter by whom taught, or by what book.

The Archbishop of Melbourne has done us the service, says Secular Thought, of putting on record what good Catholics are supposed to believe in regard to hell and eternal damnation. In a recent sermon he said:

"All Catholic theologians are agreed: (1) that infants who die without baptism are excluded from the kingdom of heaven; (2) that they will not enjoy the beatific vision outside heaven; (3) that in common with adults they will arise and be assembled for judgment on the last day; and (4) that after the last day there will be but two states—namely, a state of supernatural and supreme felicity and a state of what may be called in a wide sense a state of damnation. The whole question, therefore, resolves itself into this: In what does the latter state consist in the case of unbaptized infants?

"Damnation is a state of existence admitting of many degrees differing widely from one another. (1) Its most deplorable form is found in the condition of the reprobate, who in the prison of hell, together with the positive pain of loss, will suffer also positive pains of mind and body—the worm that never dies, and the fire that is never extinguished. (2) It may consist in the positive pain of loss alone—that is, in the consciousness of having lost God the supreme good, but without any pain of sense. (3) It may be limited to a negative pain of loss, i. e., a deprivation of the beatific vision without any consciousness of the loss sustained. (4) Finally, it might, with this negative pain of loss, include a large measure of natural happiness, including a natural knowledge and love of God.

"No one has ever maintained that unbaptized infants suffer the same punishment as the reprobate. We believe with all confidence that these children suffer no pain of sense. But are they also exempt from the pain of loss? Do they know and grieve for the infinite happiness they have lost in being excluded from the sight of God and the kingdom of his glory? Some have held that, as these infants will be present at the general judgment, they must know, and knowing, must grieve for the glorious inheritance they have lost. But the weight of authority is certainly on the other side. It is much more commonly held that even if they know that others are happier than themselves, they are perfectly resigned to God's will, and suffer no pain of loss in regard to happiness which is not suited to their condition. But Catholic theologians go further, and maintain on solid grounds that these unbaptized infants, besides being exempt from all pain of sense and of loss, enjoy all the natural happiness, including a natural knowledge and love of God which is suitable to their state."

We might paraphrase the nigger's assertion about the Devil by saying—There must be a hell, else how should these preachers know so much about it? The Archbishop's categorical tabulation of the "sufferings of the damned," and his marvellously clear exposition of the possibilities of infant damnation, might

TWO DISCOVERIES.

Interpretation of Bible Passages.

To the Editor:—I have made two important discoveries which I desire to impart to the readers of your valuable paper. I wish to do this as I realize that life is uncertain, and I do not want this knowledge to be lost. I want the reader's undivided attention a short time, and I will convince you that what I have to offer is the truth; and truth is mighty and will prevail. I want you to carefully notice the wording of the following from the first chapter of the Gospel of St. John, verse 42:

"And he brought him to Jesus, and when Jesus beheld him, he said, thou art Simon the son of Jona; thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation a stone."

I propose to show you that Simon Peter is Cepheus, the mythical father of Andromeda.

Before making any comments I will present an extract from S. A. Mackey's Mythological Astronomy of the Ancients, part second, page 12.

"Countries and cities were frequently represented by women, surrounded by attributes expressing their condition or situation. Thus Britannia is seated on the waves to show the insular situation of England, etc. The Virgin Andromeda, the daughter of Cepheus and Cassiopeia, was the representative of Palestina, a long, narrow, rocky strip of land; figuratively called the daughter of rocks and mountains, because it is a country abounding with rocks and stones, and the Greeks really supposing Cepha, a rock or stone, to have been the young lady's father, added the sign of the masculine gender to it, and it became Cepha-us.

It is hardly necessary to point out the connection. Lest some one fail to see it, I will observe that Simon Peter is called Cephas, and to further identify him he is called a stone. He is also called the son of Jona.

Jona is Janus, the presiding genius of Jan-uary, the Saint John of Christianity, or in other words, Aquarius, the water-bearer of the zodiac. "Allen's Star Names and Their Meanings" has this to say of Cepheus: "Others strangely called him Juvenis Aequoris. This means poetically, the 'son of the sea' or water. In Euphratean astronomy a region of the sky was called the Sea and said to be presided over by Aquarius. If you will look on a celestial globe you will find the constellation Cepheus within the dominions of Aquarius. The stars are the source of these mythical stories.

Simon in Hebrew means 'one who hears. Peter means a rock. I take this to mean, 'he that hath ears to hear let him hear.' Peter is a rock or stone, the stone means Cepheus or Cephas."

There can be no mistake about the identity of Simon Peter.

Before going any farther I will make another extract from S. A. Mackey's book:

"The Jewish history therefore, the marvellous part of it, seems not to be composed of new materials, but of such as they had gleaned up from the various nations among whom they had been in bondage, and that their annals might have some appearance of originality they took the liberty to make such alterations as would give them the superficial appearance of novelty, by turning singulars into plurals, and what was feminine with their masters, they made to be masculine, in working it into their histories; and in some places things inanimate have been turned into men by adding the sign of the masculine gender; this was frequently done by the Greeks."

I quote this to show that it was a common practice of the Greeks and Hebrews to change what was feminine into masculine. That is precisely what has been done with the name Andromeda; it has been changed to Andrew.

The writer in John I, has made Andromeda, the daughter of Cepheus, figure as Simon Peter's brother.

You will realize the importance of such a definite and positive identification. It would be like slaying the slain to say more on this subject.

The second point I desire to call your attention to is the 16th chapter of Judges, from verse 23 to verse 30 inclusive. To save space I will not give it in full. At this part I want you to read it with attention, and then proceed. It is an allusion to the lost island of Atlantis. I again quote Mackey's work.

The existence of the above island has been much disputed; although it has been accurately described by Plato; but it seems the chief objection of those writers against its existence is the antiquity of its fall. Eleven thousand years seem to frighten the writers of modern theology, etc. In most of the encyclopedias you may find something about Atlantis, as well as in other books. You are informed by Plato that about nine thousand years have passed since the island of Atlantis was in being. The priests of Egypt were well acquainted with it; and the first heroes of Athens gained much glory in their wars with the inhabitants. This island was as large as Asia Minor and Syria united; and was situated beyond the Pillars of Hercules (or Straits of Gibraltar), in the Atlantic Ocean, from which there was an easy transition to other islands in the neighborhood of another large continent.

But alas! this vast island, the mistress of universal commerce and power, in one day's time was overturned by an earthquake and buried in the sea.

In the Bible account of this catastrophe Samson (i. e., the sun) stands between the pillars of the house (that is the Pillars of Hercules—pillars of the sun) and bows himself in his might, and the building (Atlantis) falls carrying down all the inhabitants. This is a beautiful mode of describing that calamity, and shows that the legend is very old. An indication of the time it happened may be gathered from that which will be said later on.

We may remark that in all the ancient histories of the death of the solar symbol; we find nothing but mythological character; but in those of a more recent date, though some of them are of considerable antiquity, we find mythological characters blended in with real historical occurrences. This has been done in the Bible account of the loss of Atlantis.

It follows that the Philistines were the inhabitants of the island of Atlantis, were dwellers in villages as the name shows, and they worshiped the god Dagon. This completes the exposition of the Bible narrative of the fall of Atlantis.

Before bringing this article to a close I cannot avoid calling the attention of those versed in astronomy to the remarkable astronomical indications in this chapter (Judges xvi). Samson (the sun) went to Gaza (a goat, Capricornus), and entered that sign. He (the sun) took the doors (1 degree and 30 degrees of Cap.) of the gate (the Southern gate or winter solstice) and carried them up the mount (to the summer solstice). This indicates a period covered by the apparent movement of the sun through six reigns or about 12,000 years.

Perhaps we may recover the date of the fall of Atlantis from this. Afterwards he loved a woman in the valley of Sorek (Hades, winter solstice), whose name was Delilah (Deli-l-ah Aquarius, the man, the man aquarius). It appears from this that afterward the sign Aquarius was at the southern gate. Another indication of time lies in the eleven hundred pieces of silver paid to Delilah, as silver represents the moon we have eleven hundred moons or months, 91 1-3 years. What this period refers to I will leave to some astronomer to decide. You will find the eleven hundred pieces of silver playing a prominent part in the succeeding chapter (xvii) after the death of Samson in connection with the story of Micah.

URANIA.

Haslett Park, Mich.

August 17 opened up with the beautiful sunshine and good cheer to the campers. At the early hour of morn people began to congregate on the grounds, and at the hour of 10:30 our hall was filled to its utmost capacity to listen to the words given by our speaker, Mrs. Marian Carpenter, of Detroit, Mich. Her subject was "Spiritualism and Its Good works," which she handled ably for one hour. At the close of the discourse she gave rostrum tests to some twenty-five, which were fully recognized.

Afternoon brought the friends together for another feast, but of a different kind. The ladies had decked the hall with an arch of green and white, with beautiful flowers of glowing colors, for the marriage ceremony of Mr. David Emmons and Mrs. Ada White, both of Battle Creek, Mich., who were ushered in by their friends as the march was played by our leader in music, Miss Mollie Shirif, the bride and groom taking their places under the arch, and were joined in holy matrimony by the speaker, Mrs. Carpenter, who is an ordained minister of the gospel of Spiritualism. Some twelve hundred people witnessed the ceremony. It was a day of feasting and love both from this world and the world beyond. At the hour of five the bride and groom with a company of friends, were treated to a bountiful feast for the occasion, with the decoration of flowers in profusion. On Monday morn they left for that beautiful place, Niagara Falls, with a God-speed from all.

"THE ORIGIN OF LIFE"

Life Never Had an Origin or a Cause; It Is Itself Originator and Cause.

In The Progressive Thinker of August 9, Elder H. W. B. Myrick gives his second article on the "Origin of Life." But, instead of furnishing any information about the origin of life, he occupies his space in an onslaught upon myself. He selects me as his target because my ideas are the "stock expressions of a class." Hence I will answer not as an individual, but as representative of a large class of thinkers.

In the first place, we deny that life ever had an origin or a cause. It is itself originator and cause. We know nothing of dead matter. With equal emphasis, we deny that there was ever a "Beginning," so far as substance is concerned. Forms begin and end, but the matter composing them, and the energy actuating them are eternal.

Something never emerges from nothing.

There can be no beginning to that which eternally existed; and as matter and energy have always existed, there can be no such thing as a "First Cause."

The assumption of a "First Cause" implies that cause existed prior to effect, hence the "Beginning" was the production of the first effect. This absurd assumption affirms that the "Great First Cause," for untold eternities reposed in complete inaction.

"The Infinite Intelligence" was asleep.

What awakened it?

Theists tell us that the world is "the thought of God." Was he without thought for an eternity?

What evolved the thought?

In other words, what caused the "First Cause" to act, after an eternity of inaction?

If God's thought is creative, then he began to think only when he began to create; and if he never began to think, then he never began to create, and therefore there was never any "Beginning."

As creation of something from nothing is impossible, all causation must be limited to evolution and change of form and condition of substance; and all the properties, attributes, potencies and tendencies of matter and spirit are uncreated and eternal. And as these, at the present time, are producing all forms and conditions of life, so have they been able to do in all past ages.

If not, why not?

Has there been any change in the inherent energies of the Cosmos? To eliminate a single element of matter or spirit would be annihilation. To add one to them would make them something else, would change their entire nature.

Without reviewing the Elder's partial quotations from, and deceptive comments upon the same, I will quote one sentence from his article. He says, "The fact is, the tendencies, forces, attraction and repulsion, in substance are necessary to the growth, development and preservation of an endless succession of living forms, but they do not, and never did originate those forms and endow them with life and intelligence." So, after ridiculing and misinterpreting my use of those terms, he is compelled to admit what in substance he had denied, and confess the necessity of their action in life, growth and development as well as preservation.

Will the Elder please tell his readers just what function they perform in the "development, growth and preservation of life?" If he should do it, he would upset all his baseless assumptions. But I wish to direct special attention to one assertion in the above quotation: "But they do not, and never did originate those forms and endow them with life and intelligence." Who or what did "endow" them? Were they endowed at all? If so, what were they before that endowment? Were they dead matter?

You are one of those "endless succession of forms." You are alive and have intelligence. Who or what endowed you, and what was you before the endowment? When was you endowed?

Was the germ cell, from which your being was evolved, an intelligent entity? If not, where did your intelligence come from?

Did your body only spring from that germ, and your intelligent soul originate from another source?

Were your parents father and mother only to your body?

Is the intelligence from a parental germ or does the "First Cause" divide itself into a multitude of individual units and "endow" every physical human germ with an intelligent soul? Thus every adulterous, incestuous conception compels God to divide himself and "endow" its progeny.

It is very necessary, Elder, that you answer the foregoing questions. You assume to instruct us as to the "Origin of life," and you assume that matter, at least, some matter is dead. Now some portions of matter, your body and mine, seem to be alive. They feel and move. Are they really alive, or are they only dead substance that has been put on by something else as we put on clothes? And, if all life must be ascribed to spirit, and as all spirit is God in essence, then God is all, is he not. Thus your God is not only cause but effect also. Theos is, as Paul affirms "Ta Panta en Ta Panta," the all in, or of the all. As Theos is the all, then forms never began, there has only been an "endless succession" of Deific modes.

The Elder strongly assails my position that in the processes of evolution effects transcend causes. This great fact in nature is a terrible eye-sore to all the devotees of the old superstition; for if effects transcend cause, then the "Great First Cause," the cause of all causes, is relegated to the domain of ignorance from which it sprang. But the position needs no argument. It is self-evident. Look over the entire process of evolution and you will see, what? Progression. You see, in the evolution of the kingdoms of being, a continual increase in functional capacity from the amoeba to man. Also a constant perfecting of organs.

In all forms of life evolution the effects embody the germinal cause, and much more. The germinal cause becomes expanded. The effect is the cause thus expanded or grown, and it transcends in functional power the germ cause.

The earth itself is a grand demonstration of the position. There is nothing new in substance or energy. They are the same now they were millions of years ago. But compare the present with a hundred million years ago. Present conditions are the result of causes then existent. The earth has wonderfully grown in that time. So of man. He is the product, the effect of the life principle, changed from the protoplasmic speck, composed of carbon, oxygen, nitrogen and hydrogen, through reptile, bird, animal and monkey up to man as he is now. Every step has been an ascension, or an increase in functional capacity, and perfection of organs for the use of functions. The first forms of life had neither eyes, ears or other organs of use. But function evolved organs.

It is an immutable law of nature that the chemical union of two or more primates creates new properties and functions in the composite body thus formed. Oxygen and hydrogen combined form water, something as unlike either constituent as can be well conceived. The effect transcends the cause—is unlike the cause. Again, take bread, meat, milk and vegetables and submit them to the chemical action of the saliva, gastric juice, bile and the pancreatic fluids, and atmospheric air in the lungs and you have bright red blood; or, what the Elder calls dead matter converted into living tissue, feeling nerves, thinking brain, if not thought itself. Chemical union of primary elements creates different substances, and entirely new and higher functions.

This known, and everywhere seen fact in nature completely annihilates the perpetually repeated sophistry that because there is now an intelligent personality termed man, therefore there must have been somewhere, in the realms of space, and older and a bigger man, the cause of the present man. This older, and bigger man is called God, Infinite Intelligence, etc. This monstrous assumption implies that the infinite can cause or produce the finite. The infinite contains the finite, but it does not cause it. They are both uncaused, eternal.

We apply the term finite to forms because enclosed in time and space. Hence, the production of finite or measurable forms must, in the nature of things, be done by finite energies. Infinite can never compress itself into measurable time and space. The Elder seeks to escape the crushing force of this fact by craftily substituting mechanics for evolution, where, as every fool knows, the cause may transcend the effect. A stone thrown in the air may be termed an effect and is not equal to the man who threw it. Or, the tool or machine is not equal to the inventor. "The child" he introduces may not equal the mother in size when born, but, through evolution, may far transcend both father and mother in intelligence.

His mathematical postulate has no sort of application to the great fact that in evolution effects transcend causes both in organ and function.

But this sophistry is only a repeated manifestation of the shallowness of all Theistic argumentation. Instead of looking the facts of nature square in the face, they indulge in the most childish assumptions. They have not outgrown the childish notion of causation. The child stubs his toe against a stick or stone, and in anger beats the thing as the cause of his pain. The causating energy was itself. But it transfers the subjective to the objective. So our Theists transfer the subjective to the objective, and make their ideals objective. Fancy and imagination magnify subjective ideals and they become the gods they worship. And although they see life perpetually originating around and within them, in countless forms, they look off into the dim unknown of time and space to find an incomprehensible somebody as the "Great First Cause," the Origin of Life.

J. S. LOVELAND.

Women and War.

It is reported that in putting down the recent Macedonian rising near Monastir, "the Turks placed the Macedonian women and children in the front, as a screen, and stormed the position of the rebels. The latter maintained a murderous fire, and many women and children were killed by their own husbands and fathers. After dispersing the Macedonians, the Turks massacred the population and looted and burned the houses."

This incident suggests some serious reflections on the argument that women ought not to vote because they are not subject to military service. If women in time of war are not compelled to fight, they are often compelled to die, and to suffer things worse than death.

Civilized men of course try to shield women as much as they can; yet Chinese Gordon says it is never the fighting men upon whom the sufferings of war fall most severely, but upon the non-combatants—the old men, the women and the children. Women bear their full share of the increased taxation and all the other indirect burdens imposed by war; and it would seem only fair that they, as well as the old men, should have a vote in deciding whether war shall be undertaken.

Oddly enough, the plea that women ought not to vote because they do not fight is almost always urged by men who are themselves non-combatants. When Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer and other deserving Massachusetts women petitioned for a vote, the gentle and beloved Dr. Edward Everett Hale sent up to the legislature a letter protesting, on the ground that they could not fight or do fire duty. Yet in his address the other day to the Smith College girls, Dr. Hale said: "If her soldiers go to war, the women of America do their part in relieving the sufferings of armies and bringing in the reign of peace." This is precisely the plea for equal suffrage put forward by Clara Barton. Army nurses, as a class, have little respect for the time-honored argument that women ought not to vote because they do not bear arms. Florence Nightingale, Mother Bickerdyke and other famous nurses have been outspoken advocates of equal suffrage.

Military men, too, are apt to make very light of this objection. President Roosevelt's advocacy of woman suffrage is well known. General Irving Hale of Denver, who distinguished himself in the Philippines, was lately asked: "Are the laws of Colorado less well enforced since women became voters, owing to the fact that women cannot fight? How is this particular objection regarded in Colorado by men in general?" He answered roundly:

"As too ridiculous for serious comment. If all the men who cannot or do not fight should be disfranchised, the polls would be as lonesome as a seabathing resort in December!"

OUR TRUSTS.

"In God we trust," our dollars say,
We trust in what the dollars pay,
And he who has not ready cash
Will find his trust to be but trash,
For heaven is dark and earth is cold,
Without the cheering chink of gold.

"In God we trust," the preachers say,
Salvation's free—we preach for pay—
In poverty and woe and pain,
Let hopes of heaven your souls sustain,
If here ye suffer want and cold,
Remember heaven is paved with gold.

"In God we trust." Then forge great guns!
Warships increase a thousand tons,
Recruit your armies larger still,
Make deadlier rifles men to kill;
And this we do, that we be just—
Lest we forget in God to trust.

"In God we trust." Then form a plan
By which we damn each doubting man,
To endless woe beyond the grave,
But through belief a few we save,
That they with God in heaven may dwell,
While all the rest trust him in hell.

HEAVEN NOW.

A Call for the Abolishment of Ignorance.

Now is the time to have heaven or good condition. When we have an opportunity to do right, to do good, we can do it by act, vote and pen. At present there is a great wrong in this nation; that Spiritualists can help to overcome. Notwithstanding the millions who have knowledge of spirit control, influence and obsession; that Jesus Christ and his first followers had knowledge how to heal those obsessed by evil or ignorant spirits, Christians now send their members to an insane hospital, who are controlled, influenced or obsessed by a spirit, or spirits.

It is recorded that Jesus caused seven spirits to leave one woman, and she was healed.

It is sad to see peaceful Christians held prisoners in hospitals for the insane in Massachusetts.

These Christians have the gift of clairvoyance or clairaudience, and for these gifts are held prisoners through the ignorance of police, physicians, lawyers and judges, and in the hospitals the attendants are ignorant of spirit control, influence and obsession, and some of them are cruel to patients under direction of medical students and regular graduates from medical colleges.

Now is a time to work and show the truth, the facts, and let all persons know Spiritualism. We need not wait for any savior, for if he is, and is wise, he will not let his body appear before Christians, lest they call experts on insanity and surely confine him in a prison called a hospital, or asylum for the insane; at least such is the danger in Massachusetts in 1902.

While the ancient hell was a place under the control of mortal man, as was the Egyptian hell of ten thousand years ago, the great hell of this age is caused by ignorance.

Officers from the least to highest in power are ignorant, or the prisons, which are called hospitals and asylums for the insane, would not be crowded as they have been, and as they now are.

At Jerusalem 1800 years ago each member of the Sanhedrim had knowledge of Spiritualism, and hypnotism.

Now, hell is ignorance.

Ignorance is hell.

The lanes, paths, roads and ways to hell are ignorance.

The missing link to hell is ignorance.

Now, we need men and women to feed all humanity, and to educate and liberalize their minds; to give work and income to all humanity, regardless of sex, sect, creed, religion, color, or of what nation.

Help! Have it on earth as you wish it to be in heaven.

The operation of this world depends upon the likes and dislikes of atoms. The whole earth is for man (of whatever nation) as the Supreme Animal, equally. Nevertheless I want my heaven, now, and am trying to obtain it.

A SUMMER'S MORN.

Oh, summer morn! oh, gladsome day!
The sky begem'd with dew-lit spray,
The fragrant air of new mown hay
Comes freshly laden from o'er the way;
My heart exultant with secret life and song,
Feels freed from every taint of earthly wrong.

I see aloft on azure seas of light,
The dawn just shining into day,
The mystery that veils the starry night
Floats like ghostly phantoms away,
And awed with thankfulness this miracle of birth
Reveals God's presence here on earth.

Oh, sky and earth, sea and land,
Can this fair world be naught but vain?
The sleep of death must it all end,
No more return to man again?
Ah! thrilling sense the soul can see
The gateway of Immortality!

"Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never knowed what dhrink was afore," says he. CONNECTED WORLDS.

A Lady's Interesting and Instructive Experience with the "Psyche" Board.

There was nothing uncanny about this experience; no suspicion of terror found room in the mother's heart; peace and hope prepared her for speedy return, promising her a new leave of happiness. Soon her old elasticity and vigor of mind came back to her, and she felt an irresistible desire to follow up the mysterious yet unmistakable glimpses of hidden laws of nature that had illuminated so effectively her path of sorrow when it seemed darkest. A few more revelations came to her of smaller import, yet enough to strengthen her purpose to investigate in the direction they indicated.

She saw flashes of light at different occasions, always of light blue color. One evening, tired of packing trunks and preparing for going North the next day, she rested in her favorite easy chair, when a column of light blue mist rose at a few feet distance, slowly moving in her direction. She ought to have kept quiet, but not knowing this and feeling startled, she rose abruptly and the phenomenon vanished at the same instant, never to be repeated. Of course she took all this as evidences of her dear boy's frequent visits and loving remembrance. She also was made happy by written messages from him, through the medium of a very sympathetic friend, much versed in spiritual philosophy, whom she had the good fortune to meet, and whose kind help and true comfort was very precious to her, bringing her nearer the goal her heart was desiring to reach.

This goal, to be sure, did not go further at first than to establish connection with her departed child, but by and by the more selfish feeling of parental love expanded into that broader interest in the thing per se, into that deep desire for light and truth that stamps the honest and legitimate investigator. The questions, "Can the gulf between the seen and unseen be bridged over? Can the so-called dead return to us?" were no doubtful questions for her any more, her own experiences answering in the affirmative; but she longed to see or hear still more of those mysterious facts and creep on to their deep-laid basis, if possible. Alas for human conceit! Why must there be such disproportion between our powers and our most ardent aspirations!

Living remote from big cities, she had no opportunity to see honest mediums or attend circles, seances, etc., so she studied eagerly occult literature and acquired by and by a fair acquaintance with facts that in former time would have seemed to her worse than dreams of mad men. Naturally, she did not escape the desire to develop mediumship herself; but in her solitude, she saw no other means to reach the coveted development but to try the "Planchette," and she ordered "Psyche," a modern improved substitute for that well-known board.

To avoid exciting her husband's resentment, whose antipathies against anything occult she could not hope to overcome, she made her sleeping-room the scene of her quiet experiences. Patiently she sat up far into the night for several consecutive days, with the board before her and its dial under her fingers, until at last one night, sitting longer than usual, she felt a faint tremor beneath her hand, and the slowly moving dial spelled out these few words: "Rest! Good night!" Joyfully she obeyed, seeking the well-earned and much-needed rest.

The next evening a small message was spelled out on the board purporting to come from her son. He advised her to be moderate and write only twice a week and at fixed hours; but Jeanette, flushed with unspeakable happiness, soon forgot the wise injunction and took the board every evening as soon as Randolph had retired, keeping it till exhausted. The desire grew so strong that she made a rush for the board at any hour of the day when she counted on being alone for some time.

Meanwhile the communications from her son had been followed by a number of others purporting to come from her parents, and most of her relatives that had reached the other shore; all communications being so characteristic that Jeanette could not doubt the identity of the correspondents. There came also messages from deceased members of her husband's family, whose names she did not know, but verified afterwards. They wanted to speak to Randolph; however, Jeanette did not succeed to make him listen. Many greetings also she exchanged with friends of her youth, almost forgotten in the long course of time, most of them she presumed to be still on earth, not having any news from them for years. All gave messages to some dear relative on earth, begging for delivery and obtaining Jeanette's promise which she considered a sacred duty to fulfill, not minding the trouble or the sacrifice of her time.

Only a few thus addressed deemed those messages worthy of acknowledgment, and impolite as it seemed, it was not astonishing. Some people, with materialistic views, consider a message from a "dead" relative as rank nonsense, as the vaporings of a diseased mind, and scarcely fit for the waste basket. Others again, with orthodox views, look at occult questions in holy deprecation; such wonderful things might have been possible some thousand years ago, through Jesus and the Apostles, or at an earlier date, through the Jewish prophets; but now-a-days, "What a blasphemous idea!" Some good Catholics might credit such a message to their favorite saints, but not to common mortals, while others, horrible dictum! suspect the hand of the Devil. Happy ignoramus fearing only one devil! It has not dawned on him yet that this Satanic Majesty of by-gone centuries has lost his illegitimate crown and has evoluted into myriads of minor devils, who trace their ancestry back to our own world, whence they depart in the forms of bad men and women and, arriving in the next sphere without being improved by the journey, without any taste or power to soar to higher worlds, fall back to earth and delight in doing mischief by impressing evil thoughts upon the minds of those in the flesh, especially the morally weak ones. Alas for the truth of it! Alas for our laxity in fighting evil thoughts! Even people with strong moral fiber should never confide too much in the strength of their armor of virtue, but be on their guard against insinuating evil spirits, cunningly watching for "the heel of Achilles."

Jeanette was not versed enough in occult knowledge to suspect that the magnetic avenue she had succeeded to open for her loved ones across the border, could not be guarded against uncongenial and unbidden marauders. Her too frequent recourse to the board furnished constant invitation, and soon she received all sorts of deceiving messages signed by false names. At first it seemed all foolery or mistake, and for a while she did not refuse paying attention to the unhappy spirits who implored her to write such and such messages to a given name and address that usually proved fictitious. But finally such apparently innocent fun developed into mischievous and vicious complicated schemes.

More than once the death of her far-away, only daughter was announced; again, one of her grandchildren was killed; the most elaborate stories of horrible accidents were thus concocted and corroborated by "trusty" witnesses. The news was usually given in the name of Fred, her son, all the family relatives in spirit land approaching then, one after the other, to offer sympathy and words of comfort, but all turned out to be fiction, calculated to frighten poor Jeanette.

Once in a while only, her fervent longing for truthful messages was rewarded by what really seemed to come from her son. He told her not to believe blindly whatever came through the board, but to use her own reasoning power always; spirits not being infallible and often deceiving, besides, mistakes being likely to occur by various causes.

When Jeanette was unreasonable enough to ask for protection against intruders, she was told that there could be none but her resolute shaking of all undesirable influences, good spirits being too busy to hover always around the earth sphere; loafers, of course, had the first chance to watch the currents and interrupt or take hold of them. In consequence, Jeanette was on her guard, but hoping for better success, her zeal to develop mediumship was not abated, and soon led to her principal experience.

After marriage she had never heard again from Walter, her friend of bygone days, of whom we spoke at the beginning of this narrative. She knew that he was married, but where he lived and whether he was alive anyhow, was entirely unknown to her. His image had almost faded away from her memory, in true accordance with her conception of marital duties. The man she called husband was bound to entirely possess her heart, whether he responded or not to her own ideal of a husband and lover. It was stern duty, and in its observance Jeanette would have done full credit to the code of morals of a full-fledged Puritan. In consequence, her surprise can well be imagined when one evening, taking the board, somebody announced himself eagerly and impressively as "good friend" and, after some hesitation, gave his name as Walter B."

A long and embarrassing pause followed, but finally Jeanette's sympathetic nature conquered all moral objections, and she abandoned herself to a sincere feeling of joy at meeting thus again the friend and lover who had been dead to her so many years.

She learned that Walter, after long suffering, and faithfully nursed by his wife, had reached the other shore some years ago, and by the law of attraction, had forthwith found out where to seek her on earth. Since that moment, he claimed to have been her constant companion, unbeknown to herself, as it was not possible for him to manifest his presence until she had developed some phase of mediumship. He actually mentioned occurrences in her private life, unknown to anybody on earth but herself. He also spoke of having "read in the stars" about her son's arrival, that he had looked out for the event and hurried to welcome him and initiate him in the ways of his new life; neither did he miss the opportunity to win a mother's heart by extolling the fine qualities of her son's character.

Can anybody wonder at Jeanette's mind and heart opening by and by without reserve toward the bearer of such news? Walter, the friend of her youth, now the friend and guide of her own dear boy in spirit life; he whom she had once loved with all the purity of an innocent young heart, and whose memory was still lingering within her in spite of honest efforts to banish it for good, he had come back to her, he had forgiven her distrust which had been the main cause of disposing of her future with undue haste, a step that she had never entirely forgiven herself. He came to claim his own now that no earthly bonds interfered any more between two souls, destined to cling together in all eternity. Could Randolph deny that Walter's rights were of older date than his? Could he begrudge to Walter the resurrection and final realization of his fondest wishes of early youth, he who had been during a lifetime in possession of Jeanette's unstinted devotion as a wife and companion? Was there any infringement on his material claims? He did not believe in spiritual things at all, so why should he object to spiritual love?

This may sound like sophistry, yet the questions were legitimate under the circumstances, and surely, among a hundred women, ninety and nine would have answered in the negative.

Soon Jeanette's innate girlish nature, never entirely subdued, asserted itself again with renewed vigor. The elasticity of youth seemed to come back once more to the woman of sixty, and the newly-born lustre of her expressive eyes tried hard to belie the hieroglyphics which time had engraved upon a face that never made a claim to classic beauty.

She had successfully overcome the shock of heartrending grief, being fully aware of the fact that her dear child was alive and within hailing distance, and that her own declining years were only the near approach to another birth into a life of endless possibilities.

She felt intensely happy; twice happy for not only having found again her son and most of her dear loved ones, but to cap the climax, even the beloved friend of years ago whose forgiveness she silently craved in the bottom of her sensitive heart. It was granted without stint, the intervening years with all they contained seemed blotted out, and a lively exchange of sweet words and pleasantries and humorous sallies was soon inaugurated to the satisfaction of both parties.

Jeanette would have scarcely recognized herself had not the mirror aided her memory. She saw everything in a rosy light, and Walter's incredible stories about his every-day life in the new sphere were treated by her as poetic fiction, which pleased him immensely, his yarns having evidently never been accepted in such a flattering light.

True, the Walter of long ago never evinced such tendencies, and she wondered how he could have developed them in after life, but as he gave plausible reasons for the fact, she enjoyed the sport without questioning, while for some stories he insisted upon their being true, challenging her to disprove them.

However, which mortal can attempt to disprove the assertions of denizens of other worlds? How can we know the laws and conditions of supermundane existence, we who scarcely are acquainted with the fundamental structure of life and law within our own narrow planet?

Jeanette willingly accepted whatever appealed to her sense of beauty and goodness and righteousness, but could not help shrinking from the apparently grotesque, the seemingly crude and undeveloped and brutal, which, according to her intuition, only belonged to primitive conditions and should not exist in higher spheres.

To find in the next life an exact counterpart of this one, minus all its imperfections, is too gratifying an expectation to present any difficulty of belief to average humanity. The descriptions, or rather suggestions, of indescribable beauties and perfections in our future state of existence, given to humanity by poets and seers or mediums, are so enchanting that even pronounced skeptics cannot defend themselves against the secret wish to see all those "bright fancies" realized one day.

Jeanette, while fondly clinging to that wish, was too modest to fully count upon its realization; it seemed too good a thing ever to materialize. In the simplicity of her heart she reasoned thus: "There are too many contradictory statements about that higher life to trust any one implicitly. And what does it matter after all? I will see for myself one day, and would rather expect less and find more, than screw up my expectations and be disappointed. I am satisfied with having been blessed by the firm conviction of continuity of individual life after so-called death, demonstrated as this truth has been to me by renewed relations with my departed friends. This, and the eternal law of progress demonstarated at the same time, is enough to spur me into making of this life the best use I can, working out a solid foundation for the next one, which may be much better than this, but cannot be perfect. In fact, perfection excludes progress, and I wonder, from our human standpoint, whether there can be perfection even in the highest spheres? It would mean stagnation, and nature teaches us that stagnation means retrogression."

Here she stopped reasoning abruptly. It seemed to carry her farther than she wished to go. The theosophical idea of retrograding back to earth had never appealed to her mind, for the prospect of trotting this globe once more in future centuries was utterly repulsive to her.

HEART VS. THEOLOGY.

make a hyena smile, but no doubt such schemes are eminently serviceable in extracting currency from the pockets of ignorant and soft-hearted—and soft-headed—parents and friends. The same old difficulty faces us—How can an educated and learned man bring himself to utter such nonsense in apparently sober earnest? Perhaps he did laugh—in his sleeve.

Well, the world is to be congratulated that the Catholics seem to be advancing; according to the Archbishop of Melbourne, they have gotten the unbaptized infants out of hell and into a nondescript sort of existence that is neither happiness nor unhappiness; and that is certainly far better than torments in brimstone fires.

And the Presbyterians—the disciples par excellence of John Calvin—have gone beyond the Catholics; they have translated the "infants damned" from hell to heaven—bless their hearts!

Their hearts, do I say!

Yes: it has been a long battle between hearts, human sympathies, human feelings; human love; and the hard, bloodless, unfeeling, icy, steelly logic of John Calvin's theology—and hearts have won at last.

A Calvinistic theologian said of a milder view that was advocated: "It was nipped by the untimely frost of Jonathan Edwards' logic." So it was, apparently, but the warm sunshine of the advancing summer started anew the growth of the corn, and in these modern days it is yielding a rich harvest to humanity, of free thought, liberalism, and Spiritualism.

And so it is, and so it will be; the kind, the merciful, the gentle, the loving qualities and doctrines, are the things toward which the grand laws of high Evolution are silently pushing the Coming Man; and these shall surely win the day.

Look at the Catholic view as stated by the Archbishop of Melbourne, with unbaptized infants eternally excluded from heaven and felicity, and the rank Calvinistic doctrine of infants predestined to damnation, before their birth—Oh, what a sad pity it seems, that priestly doctrinarians should ever fasten such horrid, inhuman, unspeakably devilish doctrines upon a blindly credulous world!

But, in spite of monkish and priestly superstitions instilled into ignorant and credulous minds, with the increase of intelligence and the evolution of humane feeling and ideas, the world, including those who call themselves Catholics, and Calvinists, is outgrowing the old inhuman doctrines, and taking on a larger, nobler and better view of human destiny. Spiritualism is largely responsible for this growth into higher thought and sweeter theology.

Island Lake Camp, Mich.

This camp has been running successfully since July 24. Rev. B. F. Austin, ex-clergyman of the Methodist church of Toronto, delivered the first five lectures. They were scientific, historical, and delivered in an easy, pleasing style, and were fully appreciated by the audience.

G. W. Kates and wife were our next speakers. Mr. Kates giving sound spiritual philosophy, and Mrs. Kates gave able lectures and many tests of spirit presence.

Mr. Hayden and wife, who were to be our next speakers, to commence on August 10, failed to fill their appointment, but it was ably filled by Mrs. Emma Nutt-Moore, of Elwood, Ind., and Mrs. Lagrange, of Detroit.

Mrs. Moore has filled the place of chairman, lecturer and test medium, and given the best of satisfaction.

Mrs. Lagrange has ably conducted a lyceum during camp.

We can cheerfully recommend the speakers and mediums mentioned in this article as being persons of ability, truthful and honest.

Our Sunday meetings have been well attended by earnest and attentive audiences.

Every stranger that comes here gives Island Lake the name of being the most beautiful place for a camp-meeting they have ever seen. S. H. EWELL.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

IN THE VALLEY OF THE SHADOW OF DEATH—LIFE-LONG UNDERGROUND DUNGEON IMPRISONMENT; ITS POSSIBLE EFFECT UPON THE SPIRIT.

The punishment meted out to the Russian traitor-officer Grimm for selling the military plans of the Russian government to Germany, is that he be imprisoned for life in an underground dungeon. This is the most awful punishment that can be inflicted by man upon man; and in the hopes that this paper may do its minute portion towards formulating the world's thought to such a degree as to banish even from Russia, as it has been done from the annals of civilization, the possibility of such an occurrence, I write my experience as to the disastrous effect it may have upon the spirit of the one imprisoned.

This Russian officer's crime was indeed a heinous one, and no one can have the least sympathy for him, but man has no right to inflict such punishment upon another as may be continued beyond death; matters can then be safely left to the unerring consequences ensuing on the breach of God's laws, and certainly the treacherous betrayal of one's country is a gross breach of those laws. I am told by those above that Russia is the only country that ever practices dungeon imprisonment, the autocratic Eastern nations find it less trouble to simply kill their victim.

Eleven years ago I wrote in the Harbinger an account of the sufferings of a spirit who had died while undergoing dungeon imprisonment, and as the possibility of such a punishment, even in those days, being inflicted, has lately been made known the world over, I will (with the editor's permission) make a few extracts from the paper I then wrote, for they are apropos to the aims of this article.

"One night I felt coming over me a strong unpleasant spirit magnetism, and then was presented to my interior vision a picture of heartrending sadness. I was apparently standing in one of those dreadful underground dungeons which only a few centuries ago were the usual adjuncts of castles, palaces, and monasteries. It was dark as dark can be, and I felt the influence of damp, slimy, foetid surroundings. Suddenly, in the center, I perceived a man. While all around him was dark, nevertheless it appeared to me as if light emanated from himself, for I could distinctly distinguish his form, features, and clothing. He was tall, gaunt as a skeleton, and standing with one foot in advance of the other, and with the right arm outstretched towards the angle the wall would make with the ceiling, and his gaze was fixed intently upon that spot. His clothes were shreds of rottenness; his gray hair, beard and moustache were long, unkempt, tangled; the spittle was dribbling from his mouth, the eyes were shrunken, but glared with a look of utter despair, of absolute helplessness. There he stood, the personification of extreme misery and unhappiness. In his outstretched hand was a sort of lantern, from which extended a feeble ray as from a dying candle-end. With this he walked round and round the dungeon, passing into the darkness, which his feeble lamp was unable to dissipate. 'God help you, whatever may have been your sins,' would have been the thought of any one to whom this wretched semblance of humanity had been presented. 'He is suffering—Speak to him—He knows not he is a spirit,' were the gentle whispers that came clairaudiently to me. I did so, and he turned his care-eaten face toward me. Oh, that I had the pencil of a Reubens, so as to paint this fearful picture of which the spirit of man can sink to, for it would be making known but a truth, and possibly help to induce sympathy for the lost ones from earth, and cause prayers oft times to be uttered for the souls of the dead. My pen is quite unable to depict the utter misery of this spirit countenance. Apparently we were close beside one another and when I spoke to him he looked at me, but he was so dazed that I could make nothing of him except that he 'was trying for a way out,' always and always 'trying to find a way out.' I knew not what to say to him, and must mentally have expressed this feeling, for there came down to me the words, 'Tell him to ask for light.' I did so, directing his attention upwards. He looked upwards; there was a flash of light, and the scene vanished from my sight."

In after communication with those who had thus put me in touch with this spirit, I was told that during life he had been imprisoned in this dungeon, that he had died there, but had been unconscious of the change, and so found himself in similar surroundings, and having no knowledge of a life after death, or the belief in deity, or the possibility of help, in this fearful loneliness he must remain till help to get to another place arose in his mind. I remarked that consequently he might have remained thus beclouded for fifty years if he had not been brought into rapport with me. "Ay! For hundreds of years," was the reply.

To myself it is rather remarkable that after a lapse of eleven years a similar experience should happen to me. It seems almost as if the higher spirits were aware that it would soon be known the world over that such a punishment could even in these days be inflicted, and were desirous of teaching through the avenue of spiritualistic mediumship what dire consequences might ensue. A few weeks ago, while sitting in my chair reading, I suddenly felt myself looking into outer darkness, and at a man in the center of this darkness. The vision was not so vivid as the one above described, neither did I feel myself mixed up with his sufferings and surroundings; neither could I distinguish his features, and it lasted but a moment. I then heard the words, "This poor spirit is imprisoned in a dungeon; pray God to enable you to bring him out of it." I did so, and then said aloud in a forcible tone, "God take you out of that dungeon." Instantly the prayer was responded to for I heard the poor sufferer exclaim, "God! how I thank thee." I then heard a voice say, "That will do, we can now help him, and he has suffered so fearfully and for so long a period that we are permitted to take him at once to where he will be happy. I assure you that he has been in that terrible condition for not less than four hundred years of your time. May God bless you for the help you have extended to him."

That the spirit of man formulates its immediate surroundings after leaving the body according to the ideas vividly impressed upon the mind just before death is a fact known to all who have accepted the spirit teachings of modern times; and it is the basis of the trouble of the greater portion of those it has been my mission to write about in the Harbinger; but this is the only instance in my very considerable experience of the beclouded condition continuing for so long a period. We have only ourselves to think over what the horrors of such dungeon imprisonment must be, to conclude that no one could undergo it without his brain being greatly enfeebled, even if absolute insanity did not ensue. It is veritably being buried alive, except that your coffin is large enough to move about in. It is no use my enlarging on the horrors of the situation, for they are apparent to anyone, but the result of those never ceasing torments is to engender absolute hopelessness. That was the cause of the long continuance of the trouble in the instance above related. If he had prayed to God for help it would have put him in a condition that help could be given him; or, if he had determined to burrow his way out, as earthly prisoners sometimes do, he would very soon have been free; but he was long since past that thought. Doubtless, when first imprisoned, he may have prayed God to deliver him, but the prayers bringing no help he had for years given up saying them, so even that hope was gone.

A cloud of gross magnetism envelops such a spirit as it floats about near earth or in the lowest mist-land; the spirits in those zones only see this cloud and know not that it contains a spirit. Spirits in the higher zones can in vision penetrate the cloud, but they cannot send a thought wave through it until such time as the spirit by its own act renders it possible; if the sufferer would only think that he could be helped, he would be helped, but he has long years ago given up that thought and become absolutely hopeless!

Such, I am directed to write, has been the condition of the majority of those who in days gone by have suffered the cruel punishment of entombment for life.

THE BIBLE AS LITERATURE.

The Other Side of the Question.

Under this caption there appeared an article from one of your contributors in last week's issue, to which I kindly ask your permission to reply. The writer of said article has many grievances against the old book and places its literary value very low, at all events not higher than that of an ordinary 20-cent novel. But let me kindly remind my esteemed friend that the Bible is not a novel, neither is it one book. It is a collection of books on various subjects by many authors, written during a period of several centuries, and many thousands of years old. The reason the Old Testament is written without vowels is that the original Hebrew does not require any vowels or punctuation in order to make its meaning clear. Any Rabbi or Hebrew scholar of our time is able to read unpunctuated Hebrew text without making any mistakes. And as to the contradictions in the Bible I challenge my friend to place before me only half a dozen books by different authors, on as many subjects, written only during the last fifty years, which will contain as few contradictions as does the Bible. And still the youngest books that compose the Bible are 2,000 years old, and it contains contributions from not less than half a hundred authors.

It might be that my friend has not found any poetry in the Bible, but he must not forget that the book of Job is a dramatic product, whose literary merits are placed very high by some of our best critics, and that the Psalms are generally conceded the first place among religious hymns. It is not rhymes and meter that make poetry. They are only forms in which poetical thoughts are dressed. But we must not conclude that because those forms were unknown to the Hebrew authors those authors were no poets. In Hebrew poetry parallelism or the juxtaposition of two sentences, which in different words or images give expression to the same thought, takes the place of modern poetical forms. And rhyme is a comparatively new creation, being unknown not only to the Bible authors but also to all classical, Greek and Roman, literature. And as for poetry, has not my friend found a few grains of it in Isaiah's inspired discourses or in Ezekiel's spiritual visions? True the conception, diction and viewpoint is Oriental, not Occidental, but does that minimize its value or rob it of its beauty?

About my friend's complaint over the alleged verbosity of the Bible authors, I would ask him to take one of the few still surviving books of the same or greater age than the Bible, for instance the Vedas, and read a few pages, and go through all the endless and tiresome repetitions in the long discourses there, and then tell if the Bible, compared to that literature, is not short and comprehensive; but at the same time find how careful we must be when judging literary products of past centuries and ages, so we do not commit any injustice, but rather consider that they must be judged after their own standard and not after the standard of a much later time. It would do my friend good also to study for instance, "The Bible for Learners" by Oort and Kuenen or some other unbiased work on Bible literature. I am not an orthodox, rather a Spiritualist, and I think we Spiritualists should not discard or treat contemptuously a book which like the Bible gives a stronger and more substantial support to our views than any other human authority—if authority there be.

AXEL LUNDEBERG.

INVISIBLE HELPERS.

When sunny smiles make bright the day,
And clouds of sorrow fade away,
And like the rainbow disappear,
We know that spirit friends are near.
They hover near us all the time,
Impressing us with thoughts sublime,
And thro' the mist we catch a gleam
Of angel faces in a dream.
When deep distress like billows roll,
And hope forsakes our weary souls,
There steals within the consciousness
The faith that friends are near to bless.
They hover near to act as guide,
From birth till death they're at our side;
Invisible to human eyes
They will respond to earnest cries.
Bright as the rays of morning sun
All worthy deeds when kindly done;
Mankind is one vast family,
Progressing thro' eternity;
The noble act, the loving voice,
Makes men and angels to rejoice.
Sometime we shall as guardians guide
And hover by some mortal's side.

Vain Pretensions.

Is it not a very peculiar and very inconsistent attitude that is assumed by all the variant sects of orthodox Protestantism, and even by some that are not regarded as strictly correct in their theology, that while they theoretically hold to the right of private interpretation of the "Scriptures"—as opposed to the Roman Church idea—they do not in fact and in practice, allow such freedom of thought and opinion.

The right of private interpretation involves the right to the free and untrammeled use of reason in the formation of one's opinions and judgment of what is truth, and the perfect freedom to hold any opinions and views thus formed.

But this liberty is denied. The devotee of private interpretation must interpret according to the standards of the church creeds—if he varies therefrom he renders himself amenable to church laws and is liable to be cast out for heresy.

This fact is seen verified in the church trials for errors in matters of "faith and doctrine" or belief.

The Methodist must not vary from the standard creed of the Methodist Church, although the church holds to the right of private interpretation of the Scriptures.

The Baptist, the Presbyterian, notwithstanding the right of private interpretation, must not swerve from the creed of his church, under peril of becoming an outcast therefrom.

Practically the right of private interpretation is to this effect: The right of private interpretation when exercised to interpret in strict accord with the creed of the church, and in no other way or manner.

It is a right effectually narrowed, circumscribed and definitely bounded by the limits of the church's credal doctrines. One's private interpretation must coincide with the creed; that is as far as one's "right" goes—in churchly practice.

Hence, we are justified in declaring the "right" of private interpretation by individual Protestants, a sham, a farce, a vain pretense, a mere theory and not a substantial fact.

And any Protestant church-member can demonstrate the correctness of our conclusion, by carrying his supposed right into practice, by going outside and beyond his church creed.

The most the right amounts to is the right of each sect to interpret for itself and embody its interpretation in a creed, to which all individual members must conform their private interpretations and belief.

Sensible Talk.

Sunday-school teachers will be somewhat startled, not to say shocked, by the recent utterances in this city, of E. Benjamin Andrews, chancellor of the University of Nebraska, concerning the religious training of children. As reported by the Record-Herald, the eternal "ding-dong" of religious training was declared by him to have no effect upon the child mind except to weary it.

"Don't teach your children to fear God," he said. "Fear of anything, even though it be Divinity, is a dangerous thing in the child's development.

"Don't make your children memorize long passages of scripture. Don't teach them the doctrine of eternal damnation. Don't frighten them with the threat of the devil. Don't puzzle their minds with the intricacies of creeds; don't talk free will, predestination or justification by faith to them. And don't teach them that, when they go to heaven, they won't meet the little Catholic children, or little Baptist children, or little Methodist children with whom they play.

"If they are interested in the beautiful and poetic passages of the Bible let them read as long as they want to. Teach them the principles of right and wrong; instill into them a creed of honor which they can understand and the fundamental principles of ethics. Tell them the story of Christ. If you do they will grow up to be better men and women than if they had the fear of God rammed down their throats daily. A child's mind cannot be bound and cramped by a set of creeds. To frighten them by religion is only to make them revolt against it in the long run."

That is good, healthy talk, from a religious man to religious people.

It is a kind of advice that does not apply to teachers in progressive lyceums, for none of these things is taught therein.

Perhaps, too, those Sunday-school children when they get to heaven will meet little Spiritualist children there, as well as little Catholic, Baptist, and Methodist children.

There are other objectionable things beside "the fear of God" rammed down the children's throats; including the whole list of distinctively orthodox doctrines. While children weary of them, they yet accept them as true, and the evil result clings to them in after life, shaping their thoughts, and distorting their minds, even to the end of their lives. It is hard to outgrow the false teachings of childhood.

Lets Wife Die for His Faith.

According to the Chicago American, with his wife dead but a night and his little five-year-old son tossing feverishly on the bed beside him, gasping in short, restless breaths, L. McAlvey, missionary and evangelist, told of his faith in the Scriptures and the healing power of the Gospel of Christ, and his unbelief in the value of medicine or physicians.

Mrs. Abbie McAlvey, formerly a Miss Morrison, of this city, died August 18 while her friends were praying by her bedside.

She had had no medical attendance.

She had arrived in Chicago on Sunday evening, worn with the vicissitudes of a long journey from Honduras, where the little family had established a mission.

With her was her son, Robert Morrison McAlvey, who was also growing rapidly weaker as they came nearer their journey's end.

When they arrived at 1604 Michigan avenue, where they occupy rooms, the boy was put to bed, where he still lies, restless and feverish, and Mrs. McAlvey could not go out, she had become so weak. Even the strength of Mr. McAlvey himself was almost broken, but he recovered shortly after his arrival.

It was noticed that Mrs. McAlvey was thin and did not look well, but she refused to have a physician called. The melancholy, which seemed to lie heavily upon her, gave way to pronounced weakness, and on Sunday she was obliged to go to bed.

At 9:30 her friends noticed that she was failing and gathered about her bedside to pray with her husband. Several members of the Zion congregation were there, and Deaconess Bratech led the service.

The woman failed steadily and at 10 o'clock died.

Roomers in the house had called attention to the weak condition of Mrs. McAlvey, but she and her friends refused to the end to place any faith in medicine. Mrs. C. B. Butler advised Mrs. Wilcox, a friend of the woman, to send for a doctor, but the only reply was that a 'physician would be of no use.

"Some time ago," said Mr. McAlvey, "both my wife and I gave up the use of medicine as useless and ineffective and placed our faith entirely in the Scriptures and Jesus Christ.

"We had been through the bubonic plague and all manner of sickness and we were always cured by prayer and fasting.

"When we came to Chicago I called in two members of Zion Church to pray. I offered to get a physician if my wife wished it, but she steadily refused."

Just so long as ignorance and superstition exist, faith in the Bible and Jesus will continue. In this country perfect freedom in reference to religion prevails, and if men and women desire to place their lives in the hands of a God or Jesus, instead of a physician, no law should be enacted to restrain them from so doing. That hundreds of cases placed exclusively in the hands of Jesus and God—the patient dying—could have been handled successfully by a physician, we do not a moment doubt; yet this fact does not make it practicable to cause others to do what they consider to be wrong.

It is a matter of conscience, whether you allow God and Jesus to take your sickness in hand, or call in a physician to wrestle with the disease.

You may consider God, if you so choose, an imaginary being, and Jesus himself of doubtful origin.

That does not give you any foothold on the conscience of another.

Each one should be allowed to choose his own physician, and live or die in accordance therewith, as success or failure follows.

Rome Fears Secular Education.

According to press reports the Romish Church authorities are much concerned over the fact that more than four thousand Catholic students are attending secular universities in the United States while the Catholic University at Washington, notwithstanding the great parade made of it by the church, and the wide advertising it has received, has only one hundred students.

It is admitted that the secular universities afford by far the best opportunities, and the highest qualities of education, and this alone is sufficient reason why they should be patronized in preference to the Catholic institutions of learning.

The great fear of the Romish Church authorities is, that the students in the secular universities will be liberalized and Americanized, instead of being Romanized, by a course of secular education. That is why they feel so deeply concerned about the matter.

"Composed Mostly of Lunatics."

A special telegram to the Chicago Chronicle wings its way from Paris, France, stating that Dr. Solners in an address before the Academy of Medicine seeks to establish a co-relation between the increase of insanity and crime and the general diffusion of knowledge.

According to his daring theory, which is seemingly plausibly built on numerously observed facts, education acts upon certain brains in such a way as to produce cerebral disorders which may be likened to those produced by poisons upon the stomach and intestines. Even superficial knowledge, such as is imparted in primary schools or absorbed from a newspaper, he declares, is sufficient to cause minor crevices in the gray matter, which are responsible for many yet uncatalogued forms of lunacy.

Dr. Solners concludes that this world is getting too complicated and that its complication is made too constantly present to every mind by conversations, books, newspapers and spectacles of the busy modern life.

He took a list of the abnormal happenings for one week to demonstrate his theories, discussing each case. Among the instances were the following:

An American woman aged 40 suddenly became insane while looking at the engines of the ocean liner Lorraine.

A farmer in the course of a recent controversy mowed off both the legs of his opponent with a scythe.

A school-teacher, fascinated by revolving knives, jumped into a huge clay mixer in a porcelain factory and was chopped up like sausage meat.

A miller suddenly seized with an insane frenzy while watching the swift-moving flour rollers, precipitated into the machine his own 5-year-old child, whose legs were ground before the belt slipped owing to the choking resistance.

Two Russians, man and wife, were racing in an automobile down a steep mountain along a precipice, when the woman exclaimed: "What if we should swerve?" Her companion obeyed some insane suggestion provoked by the remark and whirled the machine abruptly into an abyss, where he was killed and his wife was severely injured.

Dr. Solners mentioned many other instances, from which he argued that the human race now is composed mostly of latent lunatics, whose individual lunacy may remain inoffensive until death or may break loose suddenly under a combination of conditions not yet scientifically determined.

What next?

Every Spiritualist will ask that question.

"Opinions" are flying around on all sides; readers, each take your choice, and try to be happy and good.

Explorers and Exploiters.

Coincidently with the Rock Island deal there comes the announcement that a Palestine explorer has found King Solomon's castle. We are glad to hear it. We had forgotten to remember that it was lost. Its recovery constitutes an addition to the sum total of objects of interest from which Time has abstracted not a few.

The Campanile has gone. Venice is going, and no doubt we shall presently hear that what remains of the Coliseum has tumbled to bits. Then, one by one, the memorials of the past will disappear. Posterity will have nothing to visit except railroads and wrecks. Or, rather, would have nothing were it not for people like the explorer in Palestine.

There are plenty of them. Not long ago, last year or the year before, an archaeologist possessed of an endearing fantasy, discovered the tomb of Hercules. He did not stop there, either. With commendable enterprise he hastened to discover the tomb of Isis. Meanwhile a colleague, not to be outdone by a little thing like that, produced the tomb of Romulus. Another disinterred the grave of Menes. But a fourth beat them all! With an effrontery which we cannot but envy he announced that he had found—what do you suppose? The jewel case of the Buddha. Why not the fan of Venus? It will be seen that explorers are a lively lot.

But Solomon's castle is worth having. We can all feel more at home there than in the caskets and crypts of myths. Yet the castle itself is insufficient. We want the palace in that fabulous Yemen whence, in garments luminous as the twelve signs of the zodiac, the Queen of Sheba proceeded with riches, riddles and romance to the wise young king.

We want, too, the asparagus bed of Nebuchadnezzar. We want, also, the dado on which Belshazzar deciphered the flaming hieroglyphics which foretold his doom.

We say we want these things, but no doubt a few blocks of Rock Island stock would suit us quite as well. The effrontery of explorers and exploiters appears to be pretty much the same.—Edgar Saltus in Chicago American.

THE INFAMOUS DIS DE BAR.

LUTHER MARSH DIES--FAMOUS SPIRITUALIST AND JURIST PASSES ON--ATTRACTED TO CLAIRVOYANTS BY ADELAIDE NEILSON'S DEATH--INFAMOUS CAREER OF DISS DE BAR, WHO MADE THE BRILLIANT MAN A DUPE.

Luther R. Marsh, the noted Spiritualist, jurist and dupe of the queen of swindlers, Ann O'Delia Diss De Bar, died at Middletown, N. Y., August 15. He was over 90 years old.

Mr. Marsh had been one of the foremost lawyers of New York, with one of the most extensive and paying practices in the United States. At one time he was associated in business with Daniel Webster. As attorney for corporations and rich men he transacted business amounting to millions and had a great reputation for legal acumen. Yet he fell a victim to Diss De Bar, who not only imposed cruelly on his credulity, but depleted his fortune without mercy.

Her sensational trial on a charge of swindling Mr. Marsh, her conviction and sentence to Blackwell's Island in 1888 are still remembered. She temporarily closed her criminal career last year in London, where, under the name of Laura Jackson, she was sentenced to seven years' penal servitude on conviction of having conspired to defraud women by fortune telling and of other most atrocious practices, of which members of her own sex were the victims.

ENGROSSED IN THE OCCULT.

Mr. Marsh was interested in Spiritualism. It engrossed all the latter years of his life. After his eyes had been opened to Dis De Bar's duplicity he resolved to leave New York City, escape the ridicule and pity he encountered there and retire to his fine estate on Lake Erie. But he never got farther than Middletown.

Here he visited Mrs. Clarissa J. Huyler, a medium. The visit, one might say, never ended. He accepted Mrs. Huyler's invitation to make his home in her house and there conduct his investigations of Spiritualism. He lived there till Mrs. Huyler died two years ago.

While he had the utmost faith in Mrs. Huyler's mediumship and through her believed he conversed with Cyrus of Persia, Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel and other Bible characters, he never ceased to regret that she could not produce pictures.

It has been said that Mr. Marsh's passionate devotion to Spiritualism was due to his admiration of the beautiful actress, Adelaide Neilson, who died suddenly in Paris in 1880. Like many other prominent men of his day he saw in her the ideal woman of Shakespeare, the flower of human perfection. Her sudden death had a profound effect on his imaginative, sensitive nature. Diss De Bar pretended to bring her to him.

DISS DE BAR ENTERS HIS LIFE.

Diss De Bar's first appearance in Mr. Marsh's life was shortly after the death of his wife, to whom he was devoted. At that time he had amassed a fortune and lived in an elegant home in Madison avenue. His wife's death turned his thoughts to Spiritualism. Just then Diss De Bar appeared in New York as the Princess Editha Lalitha. She had come from Baltimore, where she had been known as Countess Landsfeldt and had accumulated a host of creditors, whom she left to mourn her unheralded departure.

In New York Diss De Bar claimed to be the daughter of King Ludwig of Bavaria and Lola Montez, the notorious dancer. She secured introductions to prominent people and delivered lectures on Spiritualism. She met Mr. Marsh and secured his attention by going into a trance and bringing him alleged messages from his dead wife, from Adelaide Neilson, from Daniel Webster and others from whom he wished to hear.

Associated with Diss De Bar at this time was a handsome, well-dressed man called General Joseph H. Diss De Bar. The couple had two children and soon the family were installed in the house of the aged lawyer, Marsh. Seances were held regularly in "The Temple of Youth," as Diss De Bar called the Marsh home, and from time to time the spirits produced paintings by the ghostly hands of old masters, costly bric-a-brac and marbles. Mr. Marsh's bank account dwindled. Soon it became known that he had deeded to the adventuress his mansion and had made over to her other property valued at $50,000.

TRIED AND IMPRISONED

The paintings which Diss De Bar pretended were limned by spirit hands were pronounced by those permitted to see them the veriest daubs and an exposure of her fraudulent practices as a medium led Mr. Marsh's friends to secure her arrest, prosecution and conviction. The New York Bar Association was sponsor for the prosecution.

After being released from Blackwell's Island Diss De Bar pretended to commit suicide on a Jersey City ferryboat and for a while disappeared from public view. In a few months she reappeared as a teacher of the occult, which she said she had studied in India in the bowels of the earth with a Pythagorean brotherhood. She failed to pay her board bills, however, in Brooklyn, and essayed comic opera at Harlem, appearing as Cupid and eliciting a roar from the audience, which so wounded her vanity that she left the stage in tears.

Next she claimed to be possessed by the spirit of Mme. Blavatsky, but this failed to pay, and she disappeared once more.

REAPPEARS AS VERA AVA.

She next came to light as Vera Ava. She was found in a dazed state in Cincinnati, claiming to have been kidnaped by clerical enemies in Chicago. Incidentally she served a term in the penitentiary at Joliet, Ill., for fraud in a jewelry deal. Going to Chicago, she continued to pose as a medium and professor of the occult and soon met and married W. J. McGowan, an aged and wealthy merchant. He died not long after, leaving his widow his heir. She posed for a while as a theosophist and joined the theosophical colony of Henry B. Foulke at Onset Bay.

While settling up the McGowan estate Diss De Bar met Frank D. Jackson, a young Chicago real estate dealer. He fell at once under her ascendency. We wanted to found a "fruitarian" colony of converts in Florida—so did she; they both held the same views of Spiritualism and platonic love. They went to Florida together and on January 1, 1899, appeared suddenly in New Orleans. Diss De Bar then went under the name of Howard. While in Florida promoting the Order of the Crystal Star Diss De Bar had a quarrel with Cyrus Teed, and thought best to emigrate.

DRIVEN FROM NEW ORLEANS.

In New Orleans Diss De Bar and Jackson were married in the presence of a great crowd of Spiritualists, Theosophists and Freethinkers. She practiced the clairvoyant art and soon had a clientele which included many of the most prominent and wealthy women of the city. Her practices with these women were of the most fraudulent and atrocious character, and when Mayor Flower had them revealed to him he promptly drove the Jacksons from the city. That they were not prosecuted was due solely to the high social position of many of their dupes and victims.

Diss De Bar and Jackson tried to establish themselves at Bucktown, a gamblers' resort on Lake Pontchartrain, but even the hardened denizens of that Alsatia could not endure them as neighbors and on a hint of fire and cord they vanished. It was given out that they had gone to India to abide with the Theosophists, but they went only as far as Cape Town, where, having mulcted a wealthy contractor by their usual methods, they turned on their steps and sailed for London.

END CAREER IN LONDON.

In London, under the names of Laura and Theodore Hobbs, or Jackson, they established the Theocratic Unity. Diss De Bar claimed to be Helen of Troy and Jackson asserted he was Horos, the old Greek god, and also Christ reincarnated. Matrimonial advertisements were inserted in the papers by the pair and young women who responded were initiated into the cult of the Theocratic Unity. The rite involved weird ceremonies and frightful and blasphemous oaths and was celebrated by the dupes laying their money and jewelry on the altar. Diss De Bar never missed a chance to sequester valuables.

Finally the London police took the Theocratic Unity in charge. The trial was long and sensational. Young women told of the gross immoralities to which they were forced to become participants by Diss De Bar and Horos, and the result was that both were convicted at the Old Bailey and the man was sentenced to fifteen and the woman to seven years' penal servitude. These sentences they are serving now.

Ann Odella Diss De Bar is the daughter of J. C. Solomon and was born near Harrodsburg, Ky. Her father was musical instructor in what is now Beaumont College. Although Diss De Bar throughout her career of fraud has been a heavy, fat, coarse and gross woman, as a girl she was beautiful and many wealthy suitors paid her court. Her four known husbands have been Paul N. Messant, General Diss De Bar, W. J. McGowan and Frank D. Jackson. She has been a woman of many cults and has used them all to defraud. She has practiced her arts in many cities all over the world and has numbered among her victims some of the wisest, shrewdest and wealthiest of men.

The above is from the Chicago Chronicle and portrays a black spot in the history of Spiritualism. Her spirit paintings were fraudulent, her clairvoyance had no existence—in fact, she had nothing in common with honesty or decency, yet at times she had a large following, being regarded as a medium.

The general tendency among a large class of Spiritualists is to let such frauds as Diss De Bar entirely alone, and let them go on with their nefarious work, without any effort or pretence to expose them. In answer to this demand the Spiritualist press in a great measure have kept silent, and fraud might be practiced at the next door, yet silence reigns supreme. It may be well to let each person have his experience; he cannot well learn common sense without it; at least I could not.

If such a man as Luther R. Marsh, among the greatest of lawyers, could not detect fraud on the part of Diss De Bar, what show have the lesser lights in contending with tricksters? A poor one indeed.

SPIRITUAL NOTES FROM SUMMERLAND

In renewing my subscription for your paper some few weeks since I neglected to send for your new premium book, Religion of Man and Ethics of Science, which I now do, inclosing twenty-five cents for the same.

Your paper reaches perfection and fills a great want that no other paper has done. It feeds the intellectual and spiritual wants of the mind and thereby interests all classes of thinkers, and upon all subjects pertaining to human life and the betterment of mankind here and hereafter. Through its columns from week to week sparkling gems of thought scintillate and glow with fervor that radiates from heart to heart, soul to soul, the round world over, and silently echo our spiritual truths and philosophy to every class of minds and peoples. And this grand work, Bro. Francis, you have inaugurated with the aid of your spirit friends, and have succeeded in sending forth to the world a spiritual paper so cheap in price as to be in the reach of every reader however poor they may be and throwing a flood of light on the human mind, giving a new impetus to Spiritualism, that is gradually telling for the ages to come.

The few working Spiritualists of this place have just closed a series of Spiritual meetings held in their hall, of a week's duration, and planned and conducted by their chairwoman, Mrs. Spring. Prof. Loveland, of this place, and Mrs. Lillie, of San Francisco, were the principal speakers, and Mr. and Mrs. Howe, test mediums, with home talent made up the platform workers during the ten days of their sessions. Mr. Lillie inspired the meetings with his vocal and instrumental music, assisted by an organized choir, did laudible work, catching marginal notes of the invisible choir which thrilled the audiences of every session.

Prof. Loveland's opening address was a masterly effort and made a profound impression on all that were present. His oratory is fervid and grand at times, and the youth of his 84 years shines through the cloud of time, and shines undimmed, clear, logical and lucid, and bears his hearers into the clear waters of philosophy and reason.

Of Mrs. Lillie's work I would say few speakers of her sex have done better work or stand higher as exponents of the spiritual teachings. The years sit lightly on her head, and she seemed to wear the charm of perennial youth. Her inspirations are exalting and carry one into realms of ethical brightness. Her thoughts seem set to the music of the spheres, and listening, one seems borne to cooling shades of woodland hills, and hears the soft echo of far-off streams as they seek the sea with musical life. Such inspirations as our sister possesses are a rare gift, and those who listen to the pearls of thought that drop from her inspired lips must carry some of its quickening force into their own lives, however dull their comprehension of spiritual things may be, where sometime through sorrow and bereavement the seeds will ripen and bear abundant fruit.

IMPORTANT.

A Call to the Spiritualists of Ohio.

Please take notice that a movement is started and nearly completed, under the auspices of the Ohio Spiritualists' Association, whereby a convention or mass-meeting will be held at Maple Dell Park on Saturday and Sunday, August 30 and 31, 1902.

The object and purpose of this meeting will be to come together and discuss the status and best interests of Modern Spiritualism, with a special view of developing some plan for future organized efforts. The present condition of Spiritualism makes this call a necessity. We believe the time has come that an effort should be made for unity and co-operation, and that the standard of Spiritualism must be elevated and purified, and the true forces centralized, that harmony and unity of action may be attained "for the greatest good to the greatest number."

All who are in sympathy with the above sentiments, and all societies in Ohio, whether chartered or not, are invited to be with us on the above date.

HUMANITARIAN.

Study of the Problems of Life Is Made Interesting and Profitable in Recently Opened Field for Philanthropy.

WAYWARD YOUTHS FROM THE SLUMS ARE TAUGHT MORALITY, INDUSTRY AND THRIFT—GAIN CREDIT AS "CITIZENS."

Exceedingly interesting, and especially worthy the attention not only of Spiritualists, but of all lovers of humanity, is the following account, by Wm. E. Curtis, in the Chicago Record-Herald, of a unique humanitarian institution for boys.

Such institutions are of a spiritualizing tendency, and count for the betterment of humanity here and in the hereafter.

Writes Mr. Curtis: About half way between Washington and Baltimore, near the railway station known as Annapolis Junction, on a little farm of 144 acres, forty or fifty "incorrigible" boys from the slums of those two cities are working out one of the most important of all the great problems that puzzle mankind. They are organized into what is called a Junior Republic, a device of William R. George, a New York philanthropist who has spent his life trying to redeem the children of "the submerged tenth" of our city population. For many years Mr. George took boys and girls from New York City to the country. Every summer he would send several hundred to his farm at Freeville, near Auburn, N. Y., and let them romp in the fields and orchards for a few weeks. After long experience and close observation he came to the conclusion that while "fresh-air excursions" were good for the body, they did not reach the soul, and that the children he took to the country returned to the city with a greater capacity for mischief, vice and crime than before, because of their physical improvement. Hence, in 1994 he decided to try a permanent colony, and, with forty or fifty "tough" boys and girls, aged between 12 and 16, he organized upon his farm what he called a Junior Republic, hoping to instill into them self-respect, self-control, a love of labor, and a sense of responsibility. The experiment has been very satisfactory, and since then two other junior republics that I know of, and perhaps more that I haven't heard about, have been organized and conducted with equal success. They deserve the careful study of every person who is interested in the improvement of the race.

These junior republics are not reformatories nor penal institutions. There is no punishment or restraint except that administered by the children themselves. They are allowed to make and enforce their own laws and manage their own affairs, gently and tactfully guided by a superintendent and instructed by practical teachers and care-takers. It has been found advisable to allow them to commit mistakes in order to quicken the sense of responsibility, to teach the advantages of care and deliberation, the folly of haste and selfishness and the evils of the tyrannical exercise of power. One of the gentlemen who have been connected with the enterprise from the beginning tells me that the boys have proved superior to the ordinary legislators and executives in the quick appreciation and prompt correction of their blunders.

The limits on age are 12 to 17 years. The "citizens," as they are termed, come from the police courts, from the charitable organizations, from parents who cannot control their own boys and from public school-teachers who often find in their classes boys of talent tainted with vice and are not able, in their environment, to restrain them. The object is to train such insubordinate spirits to obedience, industry, honesty and self-control, and experience has shown that it can be best accomplished by the boys themselves. They are organized into a miniature government, with a president, a legislature, a court, police, a monetary system, a plan of taxation and a code of laws prepared and adopted by themselves.

The farm at Annapolis Junction was presented to the Junior Republic by Major Charles Newbold, of Washington, as a memorial of his deceased son; the original organization was intrusted to William C. Rogers, who had been with Mr. George at the original republic for several years, assisted by two boys from the slums of New York who had served there as "citizens" and had distinguished themselves for intelligence, judgment and executive ability. A matron, a farmer and a school teacher composed the rest of the staff.

Thirty-four boys and four girls were the material from which the colony was created. After they had been together for a couple of weeks and were sufficiently well acquainted, they elected their own officers—a president, vice-president, treasurer, judge, chief of police, attorney general and two commissioners, whose duty it is to regulate the finances of the government. A tax rate of 25 cents a week was adopted and 12 cents an hour was fixed as the standard rate of wages for labor upon the farm, the four hours spent in the schoolroom each day being counted as labor, according to the credit and demerit marks of the teacher. A citizen who learns his lessons and behaves himself with decorum in school receives pay for full time, and those who are not so exemplary are marked accordingly. The president receives a salary of $3 a week, the chief of police $5, the attorney general $4, and the other officials corresponding compensation. The four girls who work in the kitchen are allowed the same compensation as the boys who are engaged on the farm.

Everybody is paid for his labor, and, on the other hand, everybody pays for his board. The motto of the George Junior Republic is "Nothing Without Labor." That is the foundation of the whole system. Hence one of the first laws enacted was for the suppression of vagrants and paupers. Boys who will not work receive no pay. Those who cannot or will not pay for their board and lodgings are arrested and tried for vagrancy, and are either sent to jail or made to work on the chain gang, or both. They are required to do the most unpleasant and disagreeable of the necessary work about the place, are given rations of bread and water and are compelled to sleep on the hard benches of the jail. Only newcomers, however, are arrested and sentenced for vagrancy. After a boy has had two or three experiences in the chain gang he either deserts the republic or goes to work to earn his living like his companions.

The policy pursued in teaching the children is that the harder they work and the more they accomplish the better they can live; the more comforts and luxuries they can enjoy. To encourage them the board and rooms are graded. The first-class dining-room is carpeted, has comfortable chairs, the walls are hung with pictures, the windows with curtains, the table is furnished with pretty china and linen, and the boarders are waited upon by servants, who are themselves citizens of the republic, and are paid for the service. The food is better, and desserts and sweets of which boys are so fond are always on the bill of fare. The second-class dining-room has none of these attractions. The dormitories are graded in the same way. The price of board corresponds. The first-class accommodations cost about double those of the second-class, and thus a social distinction is created between the patrons, which excites the ambition as much as the better food tempts the appetite, and most of the boys will work harder and save their money in order to get into the first-class. Newcomers are always started in the lower class, and some of them lack the energy and ambition to get out of it.

All "citizens" are compelled to pay for their clothing, as well as for their board, and also for mending, laundry work and for everything they require. Nothing is free. There are no deadheads. Life in the miniature republic costs the youngsters just as much labor, anxiety and responsibility as come to men and women in every day life. It is the purpose of the managers to make it so. And the experiences of the "citizens" are similar to those of grown people in the real world. Characters are built up that way. Industry, integrity and intelligence come to the top. The boys who work and think and know are the leaders, and rule the little community.

The currency system is the same as that of the United States, only the money is made of composition metal. On one side of the coins is a representation of the capitol, on the other a figure expressing the denomination and the motto of the Annapolis Junction Republic, "Liberty Exalts Labor." With this fictitious coin the boys are paid their wages, and with it they pay their board and other expenses. There is a savings bank and a considerable amount of deposits, and the boys loan money to each other. Some time ago the money lenders were charging such ruinous rates of interest that a law had to be passed limiting it to 6 per cent per annum. Sometimes when a new boy comes into the republic he shows a contempt or at least an indifference for this money and for some of the other arrangements, but he is seldom guilty of such bad manners a second time. The "citizens" are usually just and friendly to newcomers, but with a "fresh" immigrant they are merciless until they take the conceit out of him.

Profanity, larceny, disorderly conduct and other offenses are punished by fine and imprisonment, but the highest crime is cigarette smoking, and the most severe penalty is attached to it, because nearly every boy who finds his way into the community is a habitual cigarette "fiend," and the management are convinced that the habit causes moral and physical degeneracy. At first they will resort to desperate measures to get a smoke, but it is the universal rule that they are easily cured.

The two most interesting features of the republic are the weekly town meeting, at which the laws are enacted or amended and other business of general interest is dispatched by the entire community, and the regular weekly session of the court, at which offenses against the laws and discipline are tried and punished. At these meetings the boys conduct themselves with remarkable dignity and decorum, and their debates are often very interesting. Human nature asserts itself early; the strongest character leads; vicious and mean traits are soon developed; honesty and ability are promptly recognized, and, as in all walks of life, there is a continual struggle between the good and evil spirits in which both are at times victorious. The managers formerly reserved for themselves a veto power, but that has been relinquished, because, as I said early in the chapter, they boys know as soon as anybody when they have made a mistake.

The weekly session of the court is a serious affair, and the judge is the most important member of the community. The detective instinct is easily developed, but informers are despised. The chief of police, who is the prosecuting witness in nearly every case, sometimes finds it difficult to procure corroborating evidence against the defendants, for as a rule the boys are loyal to each other, and nothing can induce them to "tell," but at the same time they have a high respect for their own laws and the reputation of the community, and do not permit serious offenses to go unpunished. The court is usually so familiar with the character and habits of the defendants that very little evidence is necessary in most cases and prisoners usually plead guilty and pay their fines or submit to the penalty without attempting a defense. The proceedings give them a wholesome respect for authority, and I am told that injustice is seldom done.

The Junior Republic at Annapolis Junction has not been in existence long enough to allow a study of the career of its graduates, but the young men who have gone out of Mr. George's community have proved to be valuable citizens, and several of them have sought a college education. I understand that two of his former "citizens" are now students in the scientific department at Cornell University. The republic at Reddington, near Bethlehem, Pa., has been equally successful. It was founded by Mrs. W. T. Carter, of Philadelphia, as a memorial for her husband, who took great interest in the newsboys and bootblacks of that city. It was organized in 1899 on a farm of 114 acres very much as was the republic at Annapolis Junction, and is conducted in a similar manner.

I have not heard of any of these miniature governments in the West, but there is plenty of room for them and penty of material. I know of no scheme of juvenile reformation that is more attractive or practical.

The boys at the George Junior Republic have a "yell." It was composed by a former bootblack from New York City, who was the terror of the police and the leader of all the sin and mischief going on in his neighborhood. His natural qualifications were soon developed at Freeville, and he turned out to be an influential and useful "citizen."

Hear ye this!
Down with the boss;
Down with the tramp!
Down with the pauper!
Down with the scamp!

Spiritualism and Christianity.

A Discourse Given through the Lips of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond.

The Phenomena and Philosophy of Spiritualism as Compared with the Phenomena and Philosophy of the Teachings of Jesus Christ.

In the first sentence we must premise by saying that Spiritualism is only the modern name for manifestations of the spirit that have occurred in every age, whether under the form of Christianity, or in the old Mosaic days in the manifestations of prophets, soothsayers, dreams and the interpreters of dreams of that time. Going back still further, the manifestations that have occurred in India, in Persia, in China, under the various ministrations of those who have had the gifts of the spirit.

Paul distinctly enumerates the gifts of the spirit, or "spiritual gifts" in his epistle to the Corinthians, and it is perfectly easy for you to understand, by his definitions, those gifts, and that they did not exist alone in those days, for those that are possessed to-day resemble them in every way, even the names that are given to spiritual gifts.

Jesus of Nazareth taught from the spirit. It was not his work, but the work of the Father. Nevertheless, angels came and ministered unto him. His teaching was that of the law of loving-kindness; the manifestations were the gifts of the spirit. There was the gift of prophecy, the gift of tongues and the gift of the interpretation of tongues, the gift of healing, the gift of the working of miracles (or wonders), such as are wrought by your mediums for physical phenomena, and all the different gifts enumerated as Paul has classified them. These gifts were possessed and encouraged by the teacher of Nazareth. These were shown to be a part of his work and a part of the work of his disciples; for wherever they went they practiced such gifts as they possessed, their followers practiced spiritual gifts in the early Christian Church. Even the Romish Church has kept alive the gifts of the spirit. The saints referred to in the calendar of the Romish Church, referred to in the early church in Jerusalem, referred to in the apostles and disciples of Christianity, these were accompanied by gifts of the spirit.

It is only in the latter days of the church that these gifts have been denied. For it must be known that George Whitfield, that John Wesley and all the Wesley family, that those who have departed from the Church of England in the various denominations had these spiritual gifts and exercised them without considering that it was evil. Even Watts, the poet, speaks of those "ministering spirits" and "angels" that not only attend the dying saints but that keep watch around you every day. In other words, if you will read the New Testament carefully you will find that ministering spirits and angels bore an active part in the family of the truest Christians, and that without these spiritual gifts the introduction of Christianity could not have occurred, since teaching alone would not have satisfied those who were seeking for a "sign" and a "token." Therefore when Paul said, "are they not all ministering spirits," it meant those who have passed from earth, who minister to those who are "heirs to salvation."

In our view the teachings of Christ and the early Christians (and you must pardon us) differ essentially from the teachings of theology. Of course all denominations have a portion of the truth, but none of them can have all of the truth, or there would be no differences among them. We are perfectly willing that those who think the Romish Church or the Episcopal Church, or Baptist, or Presbyterian, or Methodist, or Universalist, or Unitarian contains all the truth shall worship there. But it is well known that Jesus did not establish any creed. The only commandment or creed that he gave was the one commandment, that "ye love one another," and his only doctrinal sermon was the Sermon on the Mount.

We are perfectly willing to place that Sermon on the Mount side by side with our own teaching and the teaching of Spiritualism.

Christ's teaching was for the future world; it was the establishing of a spiritual instead of a material kingdom on the earth; it was the overcoming of hatred with love, instead of overcoming hatred with hatred; it was the revealment that God is a spiritual instead of material king, that heaven is a spiritual instead of a material kingdom. He not only defined it, but, in answer to a question, distinctly stated that "the kingdom of heaven is within." Moreover he freely and fully taught about the kingdom, which some of his disciples hoped to share with him; that he was "going to prepare a place for them," that where he was "they might be also." Your friends, those who pass from this side of life, often say this. Jesus distinctly conveys the lesson, that the deeds done in human life, that daily practices, which are the results of human thoughts and conditions, must constitute the foundation for the beginning of spirit existence.

In our view, the teachings of Christianity are very simple. The church has made them very complex. What with canonical and ecumenical law in Rome and the establishing of the Papal See under the reign of Constantine, and the various ordinances of the church it becomes very complex. The Westminster Catechism is no more simple, and the laws that have governed the various denominations. You have departed from these, therefore they cannot be finalities.

The whole Christian world has, in a measure, departed from the teachings of the primal church. Whether the Church of Rome or the Church of England be the primal church, as many maintain, you know that Christianity is not what it was two thousand years ago. John Calvin taught a more rigorous, but more vindictive teaching because of the laxity and corruption that was found in the Roman Catholic and afterward in the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Martin Luther began the Reformation, when, inspired by his religious fervor in his lonely cell, he went forth to visit Rome to pay his tribute to the highest authority in the church. There he found a state of immorality and corruption which he could not understand as being compatible with the purity of the church. Therefore Martin Luther began a mild reformation, which extended to political life when the dissolute King Henry VIII. accepted it as the state religion. Just as Constantine had previously accepted the Romish faith.

The spirit of Christianity, however, manifested itself among the dissenting bodies. The various dissenters, especially under the mild teaching of John Wesley, went forward with the renewal of the gifts of the spirit, While George Fox and the Quakers clearly established distinct communion with the spirits, Mother Ann Lee and the Shakers still further established the communion of ministering spirits. These are but portions of man's acceptance, while the teachings of Jesus remain.

We, as said before, are perfectly willing to take the first four gospels of the New Testament—such portions of them as claim to contain the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth—and present them to you as our own. But we are not willing to take the interpretation of Constantine. We are not willing to take the interpretation of the Popes and the early fathers of the Romish Church. We are not willing to take the interpretation of John Calvin. We are not obliged to take the interpretation of John Knox, that fiery, northern agitator, who, though conscientious, plunged into everlasting torment all who did not agree with him. We are not willing to take the wars that have sprung up in the name of Christianity and call them ours. We are not willing to say, while every foot of British soil is stained with the blood of those who have fought in the name of Christianity, that we accept either one or the other of the contending churches as being wholly right. We are not willing to take the swords of the Crusaders and consider that they are ours.

But all through this we are willing to take the gentle line of the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth. We are willing to take the law of love as conquering hatred. We are willing to take the law of the gifts of the spirits as proving and showing spirit power and the excellency of man. It is to the credit of this age of Christendom that the larger body of Christians are outgrowing denominational and sectarian lines; that they are working for the good of humanity more than for the good of the creeds or dogmas of the church, and that in the great world of human thought the real teachings of Jesus have a broader and wider sway than when they were narrowed down to any especial form of creed.

Time was when Presbyterians and Baptists would not only quarrel with one another, but would be widely separated in all their daily life because of the differences in creed. Time was when Covenanters and Dissenters could not meet without quarreling; time was when Dissenters and members of the Church of England could not meet without warfare; time was when the Romish Church and the Established Church of England were in perpetual strife. All this was not "Christian;" it was simply human, and most of it in the lowest plane of human existence.

That theology which bears the name of Christianity for the purpose of waging war against the helpless women and children, or even against man is not Christian. But the spirit of Christ, the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount, the spirit of the Golden Rule, the spirit of the various gifts of the spirit are Spiritualism.

To-day the manifestations come according to the needs of to-day. To-day this light is poured out into the world by various means, according to the world's present needs. As this is a materialistic age the manifestations come in form of "signs," "tokens" and "wonders" to meet the man of science and the materialistic mind.

To-day the gift of healing, the gift of tongues, the gift of the interpretation of tongues, the gift of the working of wonders, or "miracles" (so-called) are in the world because men must have external signs and tokens as formerly. That these gifts constitute a series of manifestations adapted to human need is evident. Such men as Dr. Hodgson, Prof. Hyslop, and before them Alfred Russell Wallace, Mr. Crookes and a score of scientific men would not for one instant have turned their attention to merely an ethical proposition or merely to the thought of a future life. But since the manifestation challenges them to explain it in the realm of scientific research, and they cannot do it, they are constrained—as have been other professors of science—to admit the truth of the spiritual hypothesis, just as the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles were constrained to admit that the gifts of the spirit must belong to Jesus and his disciples, or those things could not be wrought. Even in those days it was said they wrought those miracles in the name of the "Prince of Devils." So theologians have endeavored to explain the manifestations of Spiritualism, by saying they all are the works of Satan.

Henry Ward Beecher, of Brooklyn, the Rev. Mr. Haweis of London, Rev. Mr. Savage of New York, and more than a hundred ministers of various denominations did not and do not find "Satan" in these manifestations, and therefore consider them worthy of attention and credence.

Spiritualism in fifty-five years has done more to change the theology of the world than any other form of thought ever accomplished in the same length of time. Christianity was many centuries undergoing persecution. It was not until after the tenth persecution that Constantine became converted and declared against further persecutions of the Christians. Kings and rulers at that time could put to death the advocates of any new theories of religion that they feared. It was not until after his conversion from the bloody handed measures that he had previously adopted, that Constantine caused the persecutions to cease.

Nevertheless, the church in its turn became the persecutor, even down to the time of the Salem witchcraft. You have nothing to be proud of in the persecutions of one Christian denomination by another, while science has continually encountered similar obstacles. It was only in the latter part of the last century that the statue of Bruno could be unveiled in the presence of the Vatican without offense, while to the Holy See it is a continual offense now, but it remains there now by the voice of the people.

To-day you do not put people to death for this form of belief, you do not persecute them except in a mild social way; but that no longer is fashionable, since many scientific men and many ministers of different denominations have wholly or partially accepted it.

But Spiritualism teaches the immortality of the soul; it teaches a personal future life; it teaches the return of spirits to minister to and to communicate with mortals, and to watch over them; it teaches that the life on earth forms the basis of the coming life, and that every deed and thought in earthly life you reap the reward or penalty of in your own nature or spirit; it teaches all that can be taught to the present race concerning the nature of man's soul, its past and its future. Unlike the theology of the day, it does not limit the possibilities of the knowledge of man concerning the material or the spiritual universe.

It was the mission of Jesus to point to the God of Love instead of one of hatred and revenge; it was his mission to point to the spirit as the source of life, instead of material nature as the source of life; it was his mission to show that all that is good and great must come from the spirit instead of from the material conditions; it was his mission to show, that whatever is real is from within; that "as a man thinketh so is he," that you do not have to commit murder to be a murderer, you do not have to steal to be a thief, but when you have hatred for your fellow man, that is murder, when you think to do your brother wrong, you do him wrong, and that whatever good there is in your thought that is also real and true.

Not only can the Christian Scientist, the Theosophist and the best in the different denominations find out the spirit of Christ's teachings, but it is the universal Word of God all over the world. In Persia the Golden Rule is interpreted: "Do unto others in thought or deed as you would have them do unto you." In every language there is the Golden Rule. In the Arabic it is: "Feel toward others as you would have them feel toward you." For it is well known that if you feel kindly or unkindly your action will correspond with the thought or feeling which must precede the action. The world is growing nearer to this height.

Spiritualism in the last fifty years (we beg your pardon, but it is true) has Christianized Christianity. It has brought it from the narrow trammels of creeds to the broader range of universal brotherhood; it has established, or re-established, the gifts of the spirit that had well nigh died out within the church for lack of encouragement; it has re-affirmed these gifts as being the natural presentation of spirit power to man; it has illustrated them through the various signs and manifestations that have been given in its name, and, in the gifts of the spirit, it has fulfilled the Scriptures. As Jesus said, he came "not to destroy, but to fulfill."

It is only the adhering to the letter that kills, and the giving of the spirit that gives life. So Spiritualism came, not to destroy, but to fulfill. Young men and maidens, old men and matrons have dreamed dreams and have had visions; those of youthful years have been made to speak words of wisdom far beyond their years; these gifts have descended upon them and have made an impression all over the world. No longer is there the Nepths mourning in time of death; no longer the crape, no longer the awful shadow of the tomb; but garlands of flowers are frequently hung upon doors to announce the birth into spirit life of a loved inmate of the household, and beautiful blossoms fill all the rooms with fragrance to show that the life that has gone out has entered a world of blossoming.

Spiritualism has wrought this change. We have stood beside the caskets of the departed with clergymen of all denominations, ministering to those who remained in the hour of their affliction and their words were pervaded with our belief, with our knowledge. When an Episcopal minister would say: "I know that the friend whose body lies here is with us at the present moment; that he is seeking to comfort those who are mourning over his body; that his guardianship and love can remain with you, dear friends, in your mortal life;" that was Spiritualism, and he knew it. It was just what was said from us twenty minutes before, then it was called Spiritualism. But he was an Episcopal clergyman. When the Rev. Dr. Thomas, of Chicago, tells his friends that the spirits of the departed are near, that they can minister to their friends here, and take cognizance of the earth life, that they can uplift and strengthen their loved ones, not only by impressions, but by their actual presence, it is accepted as Christian theology. Precisely the same words if we utter them are called Spiritualism. What is Spiritualism but the knowledge of the spirit of God and the spirit of man wherever they may be, whatever they may do, and into whatever state they may enter?

However, Spiritualism does not accept the thought of a creed; that you must limit your investigations. If there is an open door to the other world you have a right to know it. If there is a method of communication with loved ones who have departed this life, it is your heritage to possess it.

When Dr. Franklin toyed with the lightning, the church condemned it; when the steam engine was harnessed to be your truck-horse, the church condemned it; when the doorway opened a little over half a century ago, so that many had possessed the knowledge of communion with the spirit world, the church condemned it. But like the electrical knowledge, like the inventions of Edison, like the steam engine, which does much of your work, those other forces of nature will be harnessed as your horse power; the sunshine that is bursting forth with promise, the air that oftentimes does not fulfill what it might do; the great seas that lie between other lands and yours, will be made amenable to the powers of the spirit, which are more and more unfolding to man. The spiritual nature is no longer a mystery to be feared or a bubble that is to be burst and sent into annihilation.

The spirit of man is the ego, the weapon of material power, that which causes his body to move, his brain to think, and Spiritualism—not Christian Science, not theosophy, not occultism—but Spiritualism pure and simple, has brought this knowledge to the world.

We hail any door, or any sidetrack, or any ism that will bring more people into relation with the spirit of man. But Spiritualism is the fulfillment of the promise of the Christ of Christianity: "I will send you the comforter, even the spirit of truth who will tell you all things."

That which brings hope to the hearts of the mourners, that which dries the tears of sorrow; that which reveals the life that is hidden by man's blindness and materialism; that which shows the way unto all these paths of inquiry and investigation; that which takes the torch of the spirit to light the way through the shoals and quicksands of material science; that which says to the agnostic and materialist, "If you do not know, if you always deny, we can tell you;" that which says to the Christian, to the partially doubting, to the one whose philosophy is trembling because of the lack of perfect knowledge, "this is knowledge;" that which says to the doubting one, "we can convince you;" that which says to the one that has but faith, "you can have full knowledge;" that which declares to the Christian Church that Jesus made a claim that has never been fulfilled until now, that this "comforter," this "spirit of truth" is abroad in the world and will overcome falsehood by its truthfulness, will overcome error by its truth, will overcome darkness by its light, that the great realm of the unseen may be revealed to the consciousness and to the usefulness of man for the purpose of bringing him to the ethics of the Sermon on the Mount and the Golden Rule.

We declare that Spiritualism and the Christianity of Christ are one. We declare that the Christianity of Christ and the teaching of Spiritualism and its manifestation fully accord, and we declare that these are as far removed from the theology of Christendom as war is from peace, as hatred is from love, as selfishness is from unselfishness, as aggression is from brotherhood, and that Spiritualism teaches that fraternity which is intended as it was in the days of the Sermon on the Mount to overcome hatred with love, war with justice and peace, and to bring men unto knowledge of the soul and of the spirit as triumphing over the limitations of the body and over death.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial, postpaid. Call or write us about your case. We give advice free and positive proof of cures. A valuable book—Prof. Wilson's 100-page Dictionary of Disease, Free. THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning." Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

MISUNDERSTANDING.

Illustrating the Errors of Religious Teachings.

We miss so much because we do not know. We get alienated because we do not comprehend. We contend and fight because we mutually fail to see each others' standpoint. Much of this in the whirl of life cannot be helped at this time. Some of it could be avoided if we would be slower in deciding. Largely we learned things in our youth, as being true, which were not true, and all our life, on that line, has been off the track.

I have been forcibly struck by Dr. Watts' hymn, "How vain are all things, etc." Take the third stanza:

"Our dearest joys, our nearest friends,
The partners of our blood,
How they divide our wavering minds,
And leave but half for God."

He had conceived the vicious idea, as all orthodox people at that day had, that anything pertaining to this world and ourselves was sinful. When to love and serve "the partners of our blood" is the truest and holiest method of serving God. It was the falsity of early teaching. That came from false scripture; and that from the ignorance of the mortal who wrote it. A woman in Connecticut had twin babies and loved them very much. Her minister talked and preached to her about her children standing between her and her God, that her judgment was warped; and she killed them. Does it take the sad mistakes of life to enlighten us?

Monks and monasteries are an extension of this same thought. The devotee says: I wish to be holy, but I cannot be in the busy world of temptation, so I will retire from life, where I can think of God only.

In doing so he retires from duty, from usefulness, from growth and enjoyment. He becomes a clam, a drug, a pauper, to be supported by the misdirected benevolence of others. As though he would make an implement for use and hide it away for fear it would get harmed. Catholic monkery dates back to Egypt before the time of Philo and Augustus, and the Egyptian runs back to India. It was a mistaken view of goodness. Life is the line of action.

Nunneries were not a misapprehension except on the part of the victims; it was an enlightened plan of corrupt man.

You old people who have old school readers, will remember reading that splendid selection, "Henry De Montfort, or the Knight, the Hermit and the Man." It should be reprinted. The valorous knight became convinced he was wrong, and wishing to atone for the past became a hermit. Reflection convinced him this too was a mistake. He then resolved to return to active life as a man. He reached London at the breaking out of the plague, and played an important part in that trial.

What I mostly wished to illustrate in this paper was the source of our feelings and emotions. We are composed of spirit and matter, life and form, faculty and organ, one giving consciousness, the other adapting us to the planet, two natures merged in one. The one or the other may in the kaleidoscope of causes predominate over the other. In fact we see this. Some are over selfish. The old method of explaining this was to say it was the devil. Then they had to imagine a great angel, the brightest ever made, becoming the very worst, making war in heaven, and landing in a specially prepared place of torment, from which he issues to thwart the purposes of an omnipotent God. This was a Munchausen story. Hear James: "A man, when he is tempted, is drawn away by his own lusts, and enticed."

Take the other side. When the spiritual predominates, when we rejoice in helping the needy, when we reciprocate the sunshine of friendship, when our hearts burn with the outpourings of love, it was said, God has seen fit to give us poor worms the blessings of grace.

True enough, if we understood it. It is not mechanical, however, like giving an apple to a child. It is the spiritual man blooming out. It is the awakening of the God within. As from a single whorl of petals in the wild rose, whorl after whorl is added by cultivation from the stamens in the center, so from the infinite possibilities sleeping in the soul, beauties, triumphs, glories, ecstacies spring into life, in unison with the paternal fountain of the infinite. We have a brighter inheritance than any of us dream of. Our true enjoyments are from the same source, though we sometimes misapprehend the method of their coming. I sometimes look on to see the vibrations of joy in the hearts of my fellows, even with their mistaken views, realizing that sometime we shall see alike and all our pleasures be enhanced "when the mists have cleared away."

These two natures can be cultivated either for the better or for the worse. They can be harmonized. This is religion. The power is within us, and about us, and above us. The first great note of life, with all its minor chords, are one in sympathy, when rightly attuned.

Let us look still farther. Mistaking the earth to be flat, because it appeared so, caused the persecution of the man who said it was round. Witch-fires were lighted all over Europe from the mistaken fancy, they were doing God a service. The scripture they were obeying was only the voice of a man. Women, for no fault, were divorced by the Jewish law to satisfy "the hardness of hearts." Job and Ecclesiasticus and Psalms looked at a man's body as it was put in the ground, as Henry Ward Beecher's dog Noble looked at the empty hole in the stone wall, where the squirrel ran in; and said, "man lieth down and riseth not up." Both the man and the squirrel had escaped through another exit. But singularly enough they have a following even today who are still looking into the grave and saying, "till the heavens are no more he shall not awake nor arise out of his sleep."

Of all the infidel nations the Jewish was the worst. Not a word of immortality is found in the Old Testament. But by learning of the Egyptians and others, after hundreds of years, they modified their views to admit "in the resurrection at the last day." One or two Christian sects even now date future life from that time. But it is more singular still to see more than half the Christian world, although it has grown to see that life is continuous and not extinct at the time we drop the form, still hold to the resurrection of the physical body. The magnetic collateral of the body—all of any value to the spirit in the next life, went with it, even if these eyes did not see it. How slowly we overcome our misunderstandings.

Look again. Taking the Gospels as history, the disciples always misunderstood the gospel teaching; and the writers of the Epistles looked for and taught that the end of the world and this order of life was to come to an end in that generation, 2,000 years ago. Some continue to teach it yet. Nearly every word of the Book called Revelations is highly colored figures, meaning something not literal, and yet is taken by the most of the orthodox world as literalism itself. The Jewish Rabbis laughed at Ingersoll for treating the scriptures as literal. Only the "initiated" understood the "allegories." These "allegories" were largely astrological. The ignorant did not want to know, and do not yet.

The Calvinist does not misunderstand his particular texts, they are plain, but the writers of them misunderstood the truth; or else the doctrine, when fully known, means Universalism. As an old Methodist minister once said, "Calvinism is Universalism gone to seed." The God in the souls of humane men is rising up and repudiating the unholy savagery, Bible or no Bible. O that we better understood the heart of goodness and love.

To some who may read this, it may seem like too much assurance; and you may ask how I know—or by what right? I will tell you, and you know as well as I, if you will but think. Reason is given us for use, not to "put under a bushel." "A sweet fountain cannot bring forth bitter waters," nor a good God, for his pleasure, awaken beings into consciousness to be forever miserable. Is Christ better than God? If one per cent "that was lost out on the hills away" engaged his supreme attention until it was found, can he be proud of his parentage if God does anything less? "A wise man builds his house upon a rock," and a wise God will not create a devil that will finally overthrow his work. God is not bankrupt, so we may not look for "thistles" from his planting, but may expect "figs." Allow him time to finish his work.

Our life is a spark of divinity; and divinity cannot be lost. "An eye for an eye," did not come from God. A wise God, in order to destroy sin, would not destroy all sinners but eight, and leave sin just where it was before. He is working by a wiser rule. If God wanted to forgive sin, he could do it without the tragedy of killing his son. If all the Jews are to be forgiven and saved without repentance (see the eleventh of Romans), and God is just, we are as good as a Jew.

These are a few of the ten thousand reasons to show us the world, as a world, has been hypnotized into a good deal of error and misunderstanding. All that makes us differ is our heredity, and our proofs; some of them are fallacious.

Now turn the tables to the positive side. I cannot be healthy without obeying physical law; I must eat and assimilate food; you cannot eat for me. To be learned I must study and digest the various problems of science; you cannot do my work. To be spiritually developed I must obey the spiritual law; I must live the life; and no one can do this for me. The spirit is a receptacle and record of our whole life. We print the volume of this existence within ourselves.

A bad record will give pain, and a good record will bring joy. You ask me what of the bad record? It must be corrected through the life, just as it was made. If you have wandered from the road, retrace your steps.

The objection to this view is, we see people die who are still making a bad record. In such cases one of two contingencies must occur. The necessary correction must be made, and in the next life proper teaching must be given and acted upon to supply deficiencies. If it should be that the mind cannot be brought to that teachable point there, they must return to this side of life to have further experience under more favorable circumstances. You remember the question how if any of us would build a house we would first sit down and count the cost; and the power and intelligence that originated our race counted the cost sufficiently well to finish it. We see by observation that instead of having character thrust upon us, we must choose it, and wisdom has made provision for every supposable case. In vain shall we try to crowd omnipotence down to our time limit and methods.

"Right Generation the Key to the Kingdom of Heaven on Earth." By Dr. M. E. Conger. An appeal to reason and man's highest aspirations. A plea for justice and equality in all the relations of life between men and women. Cloth, 75 cents; leatherette, 50 cents.

A True Little Story.

About twenty-five years ago I sat with a few people in San Francisco, silently in a room, for spiritual development; for anything spiritual we could get. The medium of the evening was Sister Sarah Stevens, now passed on. As we sat silently a young man came into the room, desiring to sit with us. Soon after he began making fun of what was going on, or what wasn't going on. A very strong influence was felt by me—an influence as powerful as a galvanic battery. I arose, and talked to the young man, and when done those in the circle said: "A very good influence must have controlled you, for you spoke beautifully to that young man."

All I said to him has vanished from my mind like a dream of the night that is forgotten—all excepting one sentence, "Live out the God within you." That sentence was Greek to me then.

I left the city soon afterwards and went to Arizona. I kept thinking this strange sentence over and over; then applying it to Indians, to Mexicans, to miners, to everybody, to myself, and the more I applied it the more I became convinced I uttered a most beautiful truth. I thought about it until I ultimately concluded I uttered an absolute truth, possibly the only absolute truth I possessed.

Here's a query, if death changes nothing, how can heaven be peopled with a decent, honest people unless they become such here and now, before they pass over? How can we "live out the God within us (?) here under this competitive system under which we live, or try to live? This system which pays a premium on crime, which keeps us in an eternal stew, overworks us, overburdens us, and keeps us from developing the best that is in us.

Some tell us "all is good, oh, yes, all is good." Seems to me there must be a quality of good that is literally "damned" good; for the results of this system is eternal contention, everlasting fraud and deceit. Instead of breeding harmony, peace and love, it is everlastingly stirring us up, and I look for no true science of life, no true religion, until we get economic equality, until we see the dawn of the co-operative commonwealth. So I will work hard for this end.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

You should sign your own name and address to the items you send in; otherwise they may be cast into the waste basket.

Five thousand people were in the camp of the Indiana Association of Spiritualists Sunday afternoon, August 17. J. Clegg Wright, Miss Lizzie Harlow and E. W. Emerson were the speakers. It was the fifth Sunday of the annual six weeks' meeting, for which paid admissions up to this time numbered about 20,000, clearing the association from debt.

G. W. Kates and wife served the Vicksburg, Mich., camp., August 16, 17, and 18. They held three meetings on Sunday, which were the largest in attendance of the season. The lectures by both Mr. and Mrs. Kates were of an interesting and instructive character, holding the large audiences in close attention. The spirit descriptions by Mrs. Kates were convincing and accurate.

The Courier-Journal of Louisville, Ky., has the following from Anderson, Ind.: "Dr. G. N. Hilligoss, the retiring president of the Indiana Association of Spiritualists, in their camp to-night charged the association with ingratefulness toward him and Mrs. Hilligoss. He also said: 'You can say that underhand methods were employed in defeating me.' Mrs. Hilligoss wept while discussing the disappointment to her husband, and also crushing of her ambition to relieve the association and its thirty-acre camp of all indebtedness. She had quietly inquired for the financial condition of the association, she said, and intended to write a check for all that the association might owe if under $5,000. She was formerly Mrs. Flotter, a well-known wealthy widow of Cincinnati, and she and Dr. Hilligoss met and married in Florida last winter. Dr. Hilligoss had given the Spiritualist camp his three cottages, worth $1,000, and gave $500 cash on the auditorium, and his wife bought the furnishing for part of the auditorium. Their statement created a sensation and disappointment in the camp to-night and may lead to an investigation."

E. J. Schellhous writes: "The seances of the Aber Intellectual Star Circle are in successful progress at the residence of W. W. Aber, Spring Hill, Kansas. The spirits of the Star Circle, delegated to the work of giving more light from the higher spheres to mortals, are giving wonderful and most interesting messages, the need of which is more and more realized as mortals advance in a knowledge of our glorious philosophy. Tuesday evenings are given for visitors, while Sunday and Thursday evenings are exclusively given for the work in hand. Many pictures in life size are given in colors, some of which are taken from flowers lying on the desk by the artist—all in full view of those present. These pictures are executed in about a minute, and are exquisite in artistic skill."

The Grand Rapids Herald, Mich., has the following: "The camp-meeting of the Spiritualists, which closed a week ago, was in all ways so satisfactory that it has been decided to buy the Briggs Park grounds and put up permanent buildings and have the meetings each year. A stock company is being formed for the purpose of doing this. Already $3,000 has been subscribed and there is plenty more in sight. There will be a suitable hotel built with about thirty rooms. This will be provided with all sanitary conveniences, baths, electric lights, etc. There will also be built an auditorium that will seat 1,600 people. Already there are six cottages arranged for as soon as the grounds are laid out and the sewer and water are ready. It is proposed to clean the whole of the grove, take out all the stumps, put a wire fence around it, run a sewer to connect with the one at North Park, have a complete water system, and, in fact, make the park one that will be attractive and comfortable. From present indications there will be twenty-five cottages built before the season opens next year. D. A. Herrick, of Alliance, Ohio, will probably be the president, as he is one of the heaviest subscribers of stock. His experience in connection with the Lake Brady, Ohio, camp will make him a valuable acquisition. E. E. Carpenter, president of the Michigan State Association, will also be requested to be one of the directors. Many things are in favor of this site being chosen. Among them is the fact that it is near the Soldiers' Home. This will be a safeguard so far as selling of liquors in the vicinity of the camp is concerned. The water, which is furnished by the Comstock plant, is excellent; in fact, by analysis it proves, it is said, to be superior to the famous Waukesha water. The temporary organization will meet Monday, September 1, and make it permanent and elect officers and directors. The company also has an option on fifteen acres more, provided they decide it may be needed. Street car service to the grounds has been promised. There will also be a good board walk built from where the railroad now is to the entrance gate. The attendance for the past four years was about 36,000 persons, and it is expected that next year's attendance alone will be at least 25,000. This is about the average attendance of the camps at Lily Dale, N. Y., and Chesterfield, Ind. It is intended to place this camp on as high a plane as any in the United States and have it in all ways commensurate with the city of Grand Rapids."

Mr. Spencer writes as follows in reference to the Christian Spiritualist Society's tent meetings in this city, under the management of Miss Sarah Thomas: "The second annual tent meetings are now being conducted by Miss Thomas at Madison street and Desplaines River, and will continue during the month of September, every Wednesday, Friday and Sunday. This society owns a very large three-center-pole tent, with a seating capacity of over 400. Many Sunday nights this month every seat has been occupied. These meetings certainly have been the most successful and most largely attended of any Spiritual meeting held in the State, and it is a noticable fact that the patrons are among the best class of people in Austin, Oak Park and West Chicago. The large attendance must in great part be attributed to the energy and faithful work of the committee of arrangements, composed of Mrs. C. F. Williams, Miss Ada Shank, Mrs. M. Major, Mrs. Mary George, and Mrs. Wm. Donaldson, who remain on the grounds to receive and welcome visitors. Miss Thomas has just completed organizing a development class of one hundred people, which promises great results, and the building of the society in a very substantial manner under the careful management of Miss Thomas. The society owns the entire camp outfit, including chairs, organ, etc., and is entirely out of debt, with a handsome balance in the treasury. We see no reason why other Spiritualist societies cannot do the same thing. If you have not attended any of the meetings, do so; you will certainly be benefited."

W. Clinè writes from Portland, Oregon: "As Oregon is so far removed from the busy spiritual center, we wish to keep in touch with it through the medium of your valuable paper. Spiritualism is on a steady march in our city. Our society is getting along nicely. It has had some able speakers and mediums, among them was Dunnell, Hull and Addie R. Smith. Of her mediumship I would say it is grand and satisfactory. Her long and faithful work for our cause broke her health for some years, but the spirit world gave her strength to pursue the work again. All mediums and speakers are welcomed by us."

That Miss Maud Schonfeldt, of Omaha, Neb., daughter of Henry Schonfeldt, was hypnotized when she married Philip Doremus Watkins, after a few hours' acquaintance on a train going to Salt Lake City, is the theory now entertained in Los Angeles, Cal., where the couple spent some time. Watkins and his young bride were in the Hotel Arcadia, Santa Monica, when the father of the girl in Omaha was trying in vain to get definite information regarding the man who had married his daughter under such peculiar circumstances. The Los Angeles Times says: "Now comes the story, vouched for by the people about the hotel, which confirms the suspicion that Watkins was exercising hypnotic influence over his Omaha bride. Several times while entertaining society at the Arcadia Mrs. Watkins was requested to sing. Usually she begged to be excused. Then Watkins would urge her, and she would begin the rendition of 'For All Eternity,' always the same song. She sang in a voice full of genuine sadness, which, instead of causing her auditors to wonder—seeing that she was a bride—only made them marvel at what they supposed her dramatic powers. Always, it is now remembered, she would break down in the middle of the song, and, weeping softly, retire from the room. While her audience was still mystified, Watkins would follow and bring her back, gentle enough, it seemed, but firmly, and she would resume and finish the ballad. It was remarked several times how like the scene of 'Trilby' were these, but still nobody suspected. Now they believe it was the enactment of 'Trilby' in real life."

The venerable Elliott Wyman, of Vermont, goes over considerable ground to establish the truth of spirit return, by alluding to several excellent tests. He says in conclusion: "I am a Spiritualist, having now passed the 86th milestone on the earth plane journey, and 'moving toward the river.' Why should it not be a consoling thought, that if we live right and do the best we can, we will be made happy in our spirit home, still progressing if our aim is to do right, and try to love all that is true and good."

The Chicago Chronicle has the following from Vincennes, Ind.: "George Flowers, a young farmer, bought a strip of land at Sandridge, near here, on which was located the oldest cemetery in this section. The cemetery was surrounded by a grove and contained 300 headstones. Flowers removed the headstones, throwing some of them into the Embarrass River and with the rest built a foundation for his house. The cemetery he plowed up and planted in melons and potatoes. Although similar crops on the rest of the farm grew in abundance, the cemetery crop has been eaten up by a strange bug. Flowers' house has been haunted for several nights past, the building has shaken violently and Flowers, his wife and two children have fled from the place. People having relatives buried there threaten to prosecute Flowers for obliterating the graves without giving them notice so they could have reinterred the dead. The grand jury of Lawrence county is investigating the case and may indict Flowers. Flowers' brother and sister and two of his children lie buried in the devastated cemetery. He secured the money from his father in Colorado Springs to buy the farm. To-day lightning struck the barn on the place and burned the stock and building. The place is in an unfrequented portion of the county and the little settlement in the vicinity is greatly excited."

The New York Times says: "It would be interesting to know, if there were any way of finding out, to what extent the recent coronation of King Edward has tended to emancipate from silly superstition the great multitude of people who, because of an alleged prophecy by a gypsy charlatan or fake witch, to the effect that he would reign but never be crowned, have regarded it as impossible for him to experience what has just happened to him. When his sudden and critical illness necessitated the postponement of the coronation ceremonies in June every one of this multitude shook his or her head and said to his or her neighbor: 'See; it could not be otherwise because it was prophesied. He will never be crowned, because if he did the prophecy would be falsified and that would be impossible.' But the prophecy, if ever made, has been falsified. What will the hag-ridden victims of superstition say now? The pessimistic oracle shot her prophetic arrows into the air, but it missed its mark. Such arrows frequently do; but the fact that guesses of this character are occasionally right and are remembered for generations when, through what is probably a purely accidental coincidence, they seem to be vindicated, tends to keep alive superstitions which should have died a natural death when it was discovered that witchcraft was chiefly hysteria, and spells and charms, like curses and blessings, exhausted themselves in their reflex action upon the persons primarily in interest."

Will C. Hodge, the veteran worker, writes from the New York House, San Diego Cal.: "I am more than pleased to be in this land of sunshine and flowers once more, and if my present frame of mind continues, I will never return East to live. Just think of being able to live out of doors comfortably for 365 days in the year, if one is disposed to do so. There is an excellent feeling here among the friends and I am doing some work among them."

Frank Collins writes from Edinboro, Pa., that he is delighted with the premium books. He makes a sort of circulating library of them. He should induce every Spiritualist who reads them to subscribe for The Progressive Thinker.

The Buffalo Times has the following from Dunkirk, N. Y.: "John Doe proceedings will be brought before Judge Baillet, Justice of the Peace of Lily Dale, by the Cassadaga Lake Free Association to secure evidence against a prominent member of the camp who is suspected of selling liquor without a license. Jack Witherall, superintendent of the grounds, will be called as one of the witnesses, as it is believed that in his official capacity he may be able to throw some light upon the matter. The frequency with which the wagon of a Dunkirk bottling concern has been seen about midnight in the vicinity of the camp grounds aroused suspicions that the sale of liquor was illegally being conducted. A watch was kept by certain members of the association at different times, and as a result their suspicions that the Raines law was being violated were confirmed. A prominent member of the association, it is said, was found to be receiving cases of beer by the wagon load and storing them in one of the cottages. Among his customers, it is alleged, are many of the mediums and others holding offices in the association. The criminal proceedings will be started in a few days and sensational developments are looked for."

Mrs. Mary Grenell writes: "I had a vision one night. I saw a white light in the heavens. I called to others to look at it when suddenly a red light took its place, and out came horses with their riders, two abreast. They marched as if in a procession. The horses were very pretty, and the riders were gayly attired. They carried a large American flag, of the brightest silk. They had no implements of war. I cried out in my enthusiasm, 'On to victory!' It seemed to me the vision meant a mission of peace, and that our flag would lead to victory over wrong, and justice and liberty would prevail."

Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown has an engagement at the Marshalltown (Iowa) camp that extends to August 28. She will then return to Chicago and instruct two or three private classes in Physical Culture; her method having been derived from spirit life. It is said that excellent results follow it when put into practice.

H. W. Henderson writes: "The Ottawa camp-meeting, Kansas, opened Aug. 22, and continues to Aug. 31, and maybe longer. This is a paradise for Spiritualists in Eastern Kansas and Western Missouri. A fine class of mediums and speakers has been engaged. Fine music and a band of harmonious workers insure success. We say to the Spiritualists, this is your meeting. Come to Forest Park."

The Indianapolis News has the following from Chesterfield, Ind.: At the close of Women's Day, about 5:30 oclock, a shooting affray occurred at the entrance of the camp while hundreds of people were passing in and out at the time, and it was regarded as miraculous that some one was not killed. Fifteen minutes before the shooting, Mrs. May Wright Sewall, of Indianapolis, ended her lecture at the camp auditorium. Albert Lane, of Anderson, and two other men smuggled some beer into the camp. They were ordered out. Later Lane became intoxicated and quarreled. Edward Brooks, chief of the camp police, took Lane outside of the grounds. As soon as the officer let go of him Lane drew a revolver and fired at Brooks, who was struck in the head, and fell. Gatekeeper Santford Carter rushed on Lane, who fired again, missing Brooks. The bullet went close to Carter's face, which was powder-burned by the gun. With a club Carter finally knocked Lane down, cutting open his scalp. Lane was taken to jail at Anderson. With the exception of the shooting, the day was one of the best of the camp-meeting. Over seven thousand people were present and nearly half that number heard Mrs. Sewall's lecture on "The New Internationalism," in which she made a plea for harmonious relations of all peoples of the earth, a universal understanding for peace. Edgar W. Emerson, of New Hampshire, will be here all week and give spirit readings to various persons in the large audience at the auditorium. The State Lyceum anniversary was also celebrated yesterday."

J. M. Bartscherer writes from the National Military Home, Dayton, Ohio: "On Sunday, Aug 17, we had a christening at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Robins, corner of Third and Baker streets. Her little son was christened Bartholomew William Baker. Flowers were used instead of the old water way. Your humble servant officiated, being regularly ordained by the State Spiritualist Association of Texas. The house was filled with spectators, as it was a new departure. Mrs. Robins is a trumpet medium."

Arthur J. Griot writes from Waterloo, Ill.: "Your premium books and paper were received, for which I cannot thank you enough. They are the best books I ever saw treating on the subject."

D. W. Hull attended the camps at New Era, Ore., and Etna, Wash., and has engagements at various points on the Sound, and would like to make other engagements. He will be accompanied by Henry B. Allen, one of the best physical mediums in the world. In the winter he proposes going to California, and he will also be accompanied there by Mr. Allen. Societies and parties desiring his services may address him in care of H. B. Allen, Etna, Wash.

We are glad to learn that Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley has recovered from her illness, and will be with the Spiritual Society of Ottumwa, Iowa, from September 7th to 15th. Her address at present is Mt. Pleasant Park, Clinton, Iowa.

W. L. Gould writes from Dallas, Tex.: "Mrs. Laura B. Payne, of Topeka, Kansas, who is doing missionary work in this state, under the auspices of the State National Spiritualist Association, came to us in June and after looking over the ground, her first step was to organize a Lyceum in connection with our society. As a result of her labor, the society and lyceum are growing in numbers and interest. No lecturer has ever come to us, a total stranger as did Mrs. Payne, and won the love and confidence she has; and we parted with her feeling, that we have been benefited by her logical and intellectual lectures. Mrs. Payne left us on the 21st for points south; and wherever she may go, there will go out to her our loving thoughts for her continued success in sowing the seed of light and truth."

The 14th grand picnic will be given by the first German Spiritualist Society of the West Side, Chicago, at Relsig Grove, Riverside, Monday, September 1. English and German speaking. Take Metropolitan Elevated to 48th street; then take the LaGrange electric car to grove. Tickets 25 cents. All are welcome.

A. E. C. writes from Lily Dale Camp: "Dr. Noyes and wife have been the entire season at Lily Dale, where they have done very effective work in healing and removing obsessions. They go from here to Rochester, N. Y., to open their spiritual meetings at the I. O. O. F. hall, N. Clinton street, on Sept. 7."

Arthur F. Milton writes: "It has been said that inspiration without love is like soup without salt. Perhaps it would prove too salty, if that lack of love should happen to take an acrimonious turn as an antithetical vibration of love. Is that, perhaps, the reason why nature sometimes inspires one class of people to retain their followers in ignorance?"

Lily Dale Camp.

Notable events crowd in as the camp advances, making it impossible to chronicle each one, else there would be space for nothing else in your paper. Mrs. Orr, Mr. Barrett, Miss Shaw and J. Clegg Wright finished their work here for this season and departed for other camps to take up the work of progression for other hungry souls. Mr. Wright and Miss Shaw were the last to leave. On Saturday afternoon, Mr. Wright gave his last lecture to a packed audience, receiving at its close a veritable ovation from those who have so eagerly followed his teachings.

Sunday, Dr. Austin occupied the rostrum in the morning, giving a most able address. Dr. Austin is a fearless exponent of the spiritual gospel and carries conviction in his words. Sunday afternoon Miss Shaw lectured upon "Strength of Character." There was hardly standing room in the auditorium and many were compelled to stand around the outside. Miss Shaw fearlessly exposed the shams in religion as well as in politics, and because of her liberal, broadmindedness is becoming very popular at Lily Dale.

Sunday evening W. J. Colville gave a lecture in the auditorium, and Mr. and Mrs. Hatfield Pettibone held a seance in Library Hall as a benefit for Lyman C. Howe. The hall was packed, as is always the case where the Pettibones are the mediums. The manifestations were satisfactory in every particular, Mrs. Pettibone's tests being especially accurate and in every instance acknowledged.

Monday, the 18th, was Canadian Day. W. J. Colville occupied the rostrum in the forenoon; in the afternoon the Canadians took possession of the auditorium and an interesting symposium was carried out, presided over by F. G. Neelin, of Seaforth, Canada. President Gaston, of the C. L. F. A., was first introduced, who in a neat little speech, gave welcome to the Canadians and extened to them the hope and wish of greater reciprocity and fraternal union. Rev. B. F. Austin, of Toronto, and other Canadians followed with appropriate remarks through all of which ran the grateful appreciation they felt for their reception at Lily Dale, and the great good they had found in the knowledge of Spiritualism which had been given them during their visits here.

The weather has been all that could have been wished for, and the day closed with a banquet in the auditorium, conducted on the English plan. Good feeling prevailed throughout and Canada and Columbia seem more than ever sisters.

Tuesday at 9 a. m., the funeral services were conducted over the remains of Dr. Potter, of Rochester, N. Y. Dr. Potter came to camp Saturday, accompanied by his wife and daughter. Sunday evening he was stricken with apoplexy and lived only a few hours. The body was taken to Buffalo for cremation.

The anual election of officers for the ensuing year resulted in the re-election of A. Gaston, T. J. Skidmore, F. G. Neelin, D. Merritt, M. Rouse and A. B. Gaston, trustees. Mrs. Carrie Twing was elected in place of Mrs. McKeever, who wissed to retire on account of business responsibilities. We are sure this election means success for the camp.

Waukesha Camp Prospering.

To the Editor:—Will you kindly allow me to make a statement to the public, through this week's Progressive Thinker? There has been a current report, circulated by some one, who must be either maliciously inclined, or very ignorant of the true conditions existing here, that the association was thinking of closing the camp-meeting before the expiration of the season, and that campers were leaving the grounds.

This is a flagrant misrepresentation, as there are no such intentions in the minds of the Management, nor are the people leaving the grounds, but on the contrary, the reverse is true.

The weeks of August 25 will be marked by many interesting features, and will afford a splendid opportunity to witness the very best work of the season. In addition to Moses and Mattie Hull, we will have with us Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Kates, the inimitable Parker and Bowen Concert Company, and Mrs. Jessie Holt-Beach, an elocutionist of note. These people must be heard to be appreciated.

There will be concerts, lectures, test seances, phenomenal seances, etc., of the very highest order. Something of interest will transpire everyday. So if any have been misled by the adverse reports, there is still time to rectify the mistake, and come and spend a few days with us, and enjoy the feast we have prepared.

Grand Ledge Camp, Mich.

To the Editor:—Last Saturday, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague arrived in our camp to begin their week's engagement. They are accompanied by their daughter, Mrs. Marie Holden, of Grand Rapids. The work of these noble souls is much appreciated by our people. Mr. Sprague's lectures are bright, sparkling with wit and humor, and best of all educational. Mrs. Sprague gives those sweet spiritual messages that are so comforting to those souls that are hungering for tidings from the loved ones gone before.

Sunday afternoon, a farewell reception was held in the hotel parlors for Mr. J. Guiwits, for many years one of the familiar figures of our camp. Many expressions of kindest good will were offered, and after giving three cheers for this grand old pioneer, we bade him God-speed, and left with him the wish that he (with his "twin") would be with us next year and many years to come.

Wednesday afternoon, the Willing Workers held their election. The result of the ballot: Mrs. N. M. Russell, president; Mrs. Dell Teeter, vice-president; Mrs. Mary Hite, secretary, and Mrs. T. Fodman, treasurer.

The regular social hop was given Wednesday evening, the last of the season.

We had expected to have with us Dr. E. E. Parker, of Fort Wayne, Ind., but he having passed to spirit life, we are compelled to make a change in our program Saturday afternoon, and we are pleased to inform her many friends that Mrs. A. E. Sheets will occupy the rostrum on that date, her health permitting.

Sunday morning and afternoon, Mrs. Martha E. Root, president of the Michigan Equal Suffrage Association, will occupy our platform. Mrs. Root is a pleasing speaker, with a winning personality, and is well fitted by education and inspirational powers for the position she occupies in the spiritual ranks and other walks of life. Mrs. N. M. Russell will precede the afternoon discourse with spirit messages.

Sunday, August 24, is the last day of our present session, and it will be with feelings of regret that we break camp and go to our several homes, and we hope and trust that next year we may all be privileged to meet here on these beautiful grounds.

Kola Plant CURES HAY FEVER AND ASTHMA.

FREE. The African Kola Plant is Nature's Positive Cure for Hay-fever and Asthma. In the short time since its discovery this remarkable botanical has proved its use in the hospitals of Europe and America as an unfailing specific cure for Hay-fever and Asthma in every form. Its cures are really marvelous. Dr. W. H. Vail, a prominent physician of St. Louis, Mo., writes March 8th, 1902, that he used Himalya on six different Hay-fever patients last fall with satisfactory results in each case. Mrs. M. A. Scott, Crosby, Mich., writes March 6th, 1902, that Himalya completely cured her after fifteen years persistent suffering of Hay-fever and Asthma. Rev. J. L. Combs of Martinsburg, W. Va., wrote to the New York World, July 23rd, that Himalya cured him of Asthma of thirty years' standing. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, editor of the Farmer's Magazine, Washington D.C. was also cured, although he could not lie down for fear of choking, being always worse in Hay-fever season. Hundreds of others send similar testimony proving Himalya truly a wonderful remedy. As the Kola Plant is a specific constitutional cure for the disease, Hay-fever sufferers should use it before the season of the attacks when practical, so as to give it time to act on the system. If you suffer from Hay-fever or Asthma, in order to prove the power of this new botanical discovery, we will send you one trial case by mail entirely free. It costs you absolutely nothing. Write to-day to The Kola Importing Co., No. 1162 Broadway, New York.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal bearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters; Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Henry Brunner: Q. A friend has gone into a trance or hypnotic sleep, saying as he entered it, he felt queer, and had a premonition that he should not wake again in ten years. It has been now four days. He sleeps, arises, moves around, but sleeps. As he eats nothing, although he drinks water freely, is it possible for him to remain without food for that time?

A. As we learn that this subject of trance has been intently reading books on "Personal Magnetism," Hypnotism, Suggestive Therapeutics, etc., there can be but one conclusion, that he has become overwrought, and his mental aberration has taken this peculiar form. In such a mental state with plethoric habit, he may prolong his fast for weeks, but not beyond a limited time of thirty-five days at most. As insane persons often refuse food, and will starve unless they are forced to partake of it, so this subject may refuse food until dying with starvation. His friends should guard him from this, nor be allured by belief in his being in trance, hypnotized, or otherwise than suffering from overtension of the brain. For this he should be treated, and will recover. Yet having struck on the fancy that he is asleep, he may adhere to the pretense for a long period of time.

D. A. Richardson: Q. I have sat regularly for slate-writing and trumpet for three years and yet have not received the slightest manifestation. Would you advise me to continue?

A. This correspondent shows remarkable perseverance, but his seances have not been held in conformity with the laws and conditions of control. To sit for any declared phase is certain to bring disappointment. If he will organize a circle by the rules given in Mediumship and its Laws, he will receive manifestations such as the conditions furnished will allow.

H. A. C.: Q. (1) How many Bibles are there?

(2) What is the difference between the Catholic and Protestant Bibles?

A. (1) The Hindus have the Vedas;
The Persians the Shaster;
The Chinese the Book of Kings;
The Mohammedans Al Koran;
The Christians the Old and New Testament;
The Mormons the Book of Mormon.

(2) The Catholic church discourages reading of the Bible by the laity, and strictly forbids their reading the Protestant Scriptures. The version it allows is of course translated and revised for the church's benefit, and intensely Catholic.

To place the Bible in the hands of the people was the great effort of Luther. He made the first translation into German, of the New Testament, (1522), and with the help of others the Old. The perfection of translation of the English Bible has been of slow growth. John Wickliff in 1384 made the first. Tyndall made a better translation and was burned at the stake therefor. His work was finished by Coverdale in 1535. The Calvinists published a "Geneva Bible," and in 1568 there was issued the "Bishop's Bible," the "authorized version." In 1611 King James' version was published and has ever since maintained its position. The recent attempts to displace it by new translations have failed. For if the much-quoted passages are put in plain modern English they lose all their charms. In 1610 the Catholics in England published the "Douay Bible," prepared for Catholic use. The reason assigned by the Catholic church for not encouraging the reading of the Bible by the laity, is, granting the premises, strictly logical and praiseworthy. An infinite God has given the Book as an infinite revelation to man. Man is finite and cannot understand such an infinite revelation. To attempt to do so would lead to misunderstanding, confusion and the ruin of his soul. But God through St. Peter, endorsed by Jesus Christ, has given the priesthood this infinite discernment to explain this revelation to the laity. Hence the latter's attempt to gain understanding is at great peril and they should always consult the priests and accept their word as from God. To make the matter more mysterious, the Bible of the priests is in Latin, as are the services.

E. Cadwell: Q. Is there any reliable or satisfactory evidence of the existence of Jesus of Nazareth?

A. The Christian believer must rest content with the evidences furnished by the New Testament, and any attempt to fortify his position by consulting pagan historians will lead him to disappointment. Of the value of evidences furnished by the Bible this question does not require us to speak; whatever it is it must be accepted as absolutely exhaustive. It is true pagan authors have been quoted, but the best biblical scholars now doubt or boldly declare the passages which have been so eagerly quoted, forged and interpolated. The mention in Josephus is too transparent to deceive anyone.

The historian Pliny, born C. E. 62, as well as Tacitus, and Celsus if they wrote at all of the Jews, wrote from hearsay—the talk of the Christians, and Tacitus, on whom the greatest reliance has been placed, wrote in the second century and hence from hearsay. The brief mention he makes has been shown to be interpolated by some copyist who made the change to suit his own views. The letter of Abgarus to Christ, and the reply, maintained to be true by the head of the church for a long time, are declared forgeries by the Catholic leaders.

The Decretals, which were second in authority to the Bible, were declared to be the work of early councils from the birth of Christ to A. C. 498, both Catholic and Protestant critics unite in calling them forgeries. There was no history of this early period. The most vigorous of the heretical Christian sects, did not believe that Christ was a personality, and the hottest controversies were held over this dogma.

Of the church fathers, Origen A. D. 254, the only scholar the Eastern Christian church can claim, was one of, if not the greatest. After years of labor for Christianity he renounced it and returned to the noble Greek philosophy. In his voluminous writings in favor of Christianity he makes no allusion to Christ as a man—Christ was the truth. The same may be said of all the early Christian writers; not a new fact, not a saying of the master is to be found in their pages.

Of this great world-event, the birth, life and death of a God, fraught with the most momentous consequences to mankind, in all the pages of the contemporary Roman historians there is not a line of mention. Such are the facts, and the investigator must draw his own conclusions. The question so far from being "settled," in the affirmative, remains to test the faith of its believers to the utmost limit.

J. W. D., Cal.: Q. (1) Is it not proved beyond question that the Pentateuch was written by Moses?

(2) Are not the events there recorded confirmed by profane history?

A. (1) Every theological scholar of any standing affirms that Moses wrote the Pentateuch. On the contrary these books were written at wide intervals of time by different authors. They are among the earliest compositions of the Semitic people. No one knows by whom they were written, or can guess within thousands of years of the time.

(2) There is not a line in profane history confirming the events recorded in the "Books of Moses." Their acceptance must rest absolutely and entirely on the internal evidence they furnish.

C. H. M.: Q. Is Spiritualism a knowledge or a belief?

A. Spiritualism has for its fundamental object to give knowledge of the future and of spirit existence.

It may be a belief—a faith with those who are willing to accept it in that manner, or absolute knowledge by those who study it as a science.

Maple Dell Camp, O.

We are still having a good time at Maple Dell Camp. Our attendance is increasing each week, the weather more settled and good health at the camp, and all seem happy, not a discord.

Our president has recovered from his attack of rheumatism, and is lively as some of our younger men; is everywhere wanted, and manages to get there, and with a smile and a cheering word.

We are only saddened by the loss of one of our number passing out who had long been a sufferer, but was with us for a few days, and was so happy, but she will now dwell with our camp in the spirit.

Passed to spirit life, our sister, Mrs. Olive A. Beacher, after much suffering. She was laid to rest on last Sunday by the Eastern Star order, of which she was a member. She leaves one son to mourn her, the husband having gone before.

We have a state convention the last of the month that will bring many from a distance, and we hope for a flow of spiritual blessing.

E. A. RATHBUN.

Clinton Camp, Iowa.

The annual election of officers of the M. V. S. A. occurred at Mt. Pleasant Park, Clinton, Iowa, August 15. The following officers were elected: President, W. F. Peck; vice-president, Emma J. Knowles; secretary, Mollie B. Anderson, Clarksville, Mo. Trustees, W. M. Kellogg and Max Hoffmann.

Many plans are contemplated for the improvement of the camp, among them the use of electric lights which, I believe, is insured for next year. I wish to say a word for our new secretary. She is a lady of marked ability and will undoubtedly carry on the business with enterprise and success. I hope all interested will uphold her hands and make the work both pleasant and easy for her.

Our attendance is about the same as usual. Our gate receipts show this without a doubt. We have had only one fair Sunday, which has made those days dull to what they usually are.

FEELING, AND ETHICS.

Conditions Necessary to the Advancement of Spiritualism.

It may seem presumptuous to affirm that the basic fact of Ethics, as a science, is ignored. As analogous, the time was when the mass of mankind were just as sure that the sun rose and set every twenty-four hours, as they were of anything. They thought they had ocular demonstration of the fact; but now we know that they did not know. The ancients made a distinction between the stars and the planets. Copernicus formulated the movement of the latter; Galileo demonstrated it, and supposed their orbits were circular; but Kepler discovered that they were ellipses, and after nearly twenty years of laborious effort, he declared his three planetary laws; and yet, astronomy was no science, and could not be until Newton discovered the laws of attraction and motion which were modes of the operation of forces. The idea of force as the cause of phenomena was never considered until the law of its action was discovered. It was then seen that phenomena were the result of a force acting on matter. By this law, all the movements of the planets and their satellites were explained, and planetary astronomy became a possible science.

During the Middle Ages, the mass of mankind—even the philosophers—accepted the idea that all matter consisted of four elements—earth, air, fire and water; and great expectations arose as to the benefits that could be obtained by their combination and transmutation. Gold would become plentiful; the elixir of life, to preserve perpetual youth, could be discovered by some combination, and the philosopher's stone which, like Eve's fabled apple, would make one wise. The philosophers wrestled with these problems for hundreds of years, when one Dr. Priestly discovered oxygen—something which they had never dreamed of, which proved to be a mighty agent and knocked all theories and schemes into so many absurdities. Then was discovered another force—chemical affinity. Oxygen, uniting with hydrogen in certain definite proportions, formed water. Having discovered the law of this force, chemistry was made a possible science.

We have a theory accepted by the mass of mankind, that knowledge is the product of all human activities—the guide and director of all human affairs. This is the ethical analogue—the geocentric theory and alchemy being the mechanical and chemical ones.

In early times of our history there were two systems of philosophy—the Ionic and the Eleatic—that flourished before the time of Socrates. When he gave them a careful study he pronounced them sophistries. Abandoning these, he began to study human nature by observing the conduct of men.

He went into the streets of Athens and began to interrogate the people. By skillful analysis, he showed them that their answers were erroneous, and their ideas absurd. Thus he went from one to another, all day long. After a while he became conspicuous, and attracted thinkers and investigators.

He said: "To know the good and not to seek it, is akin to madness." He thought the good could be acquired, and he called it knowledge, which afterward he called virtue. This is a word that he could analyze, and he did it thus: Virtue in itself has four elements—(1)piety, (2) justice, (3) courage, (4) temperance.

It will be seen that these are states of feeling—not knowledge, though he did not see the distinction between a feeling and an idea. The latter is the consciousness of the conception of an idea which may be true or false—far more likely the latter—and the former (feeling) is always real, though that which arouses it may be unreal.

Socrates' analysis of virtue contains the basic element of ethics (feeling), but as he did not write, his disciples, notably Plato, after his death, undertook to set forth his teachings in written language. But either they did not apprehend his analysis of virtue or they ignored it. Plato was full of theories and airy visions; his own cogitations suiting him better than the teachings of his master, though ostensibly embodying them. He went off on a tangent and elaborated his own conceptions; and thus the basic element of ethics was lost to the world.

The question that puzzled Socrates was, What is good? He felt the good himself, and acted accordingly. He thought that all men should seek the good. He did not realize that feeling the good could only give rise to good conduct. Why did not all men seek the good? What he overlooked was that feeling is a force, and that human conduct is the result of its action. The laws of human conduct were not discovered; therefore, ethics as a science was impossible.

The great mass of mankind still accept the theory that knowledge is power. This theory being false, serves as a complete barrier to the science of ethics, just as the geocentric theory and alchemy were barriers to astronomy and chemistry and their allied sciences.

The feelings are not acquired, de novo. The germs of them are innate. They cannot be developed by an appeal to the intellect; that is, by precept, or by the acquisition of knowledge. It is only by their due exercise that they are developed, unfolded and cultured. Knowledge has no effect on them. It is only instrumental in devising and applying means for the gratification of the feelings that knowledge is employed, or can be employed; and the effort made to gratify them is human conduct.

Feeling is a force that moves to human conduct. The mode of its action is natural law. It is in the nature of a desire, aversion, spiritual aspiration, love of justice, love of self, of conjugal, parental, filial, fraternal, philanthropic love, love of approbation; passion; as anger, revenge, jealousy, or envy, avarice, ambition, hunger, thirst, and all other sensations, pleasant and painful; and the like. These combine in innumerable ways, and when very intensively active they act singly, presenting every conceivable form and aspect of activity.

Since man's feelings differ, their conduct differs accordingly; but in the main, being selfish and sensuous, they antagonize; creating the conflicts and struggles that characterize our civilization. We can now see why ethics, so-called, remains in a speculative, chaotic condition. Man's notions, opinions and beliefs become finalities, and nothing can change them without a corresponding change of feeling. So long as we feel that knowledge is the prime, causal factor in human activities, and consequently the producing cause of human conduct, we must necessarily fail in the solution of life's problems. The cart cannot pull the horse; the effect cannot produce the cause; but so long as we persist in regarding knowledge as the producing cause of voluntary, rational activity, we certainly must fail.

In a recent article in The Progressive Thinker it closes with: "Intelligence is the Savior of Man and the Joy of Heaven."

Let us analyze this statement. Intelligence is from the Latin, intus, within, and lego, to collect. It may be defined as notice, information collected and communicated, knowledge of things distant or before unknown. It is always external to us, while feeling is always internal. Intelligence saves. It must be a force, or it could not act; it must save from something which it dreads; therefore it must have feeling. These attributes make it an entity; for that which can act, desire, and will, is an entity. For instance, A comes to me and says: "Your lawsuit has been decided in your favor." This is intelligence to me, and gives me joy. He gathered that intelligence. It did not exist prior to the decision. Certain events gave rise to it which culminated in a condition which afforded me means of enjoyment. That means enables me to gratify my feelings, hence the joy. It is the cognition of means that I can employ as means of enjoyment. It is nothing more—nothing less. If the writer had said, "Intelligence is a means instrumental in saving man, and enables him to rejoice in heaven," he would have expressed a truth. As for the joy, I would rather have it myself.

Now, here is the same appearance that made a man say, hundreds of years ago, "The sun rises; I know it does;" but he did not know it; and the other fellow to say "The four elements of matter are earth, air, fire and water, I know it because I see them;" but he did not see them. "Intelligence is the savior of man and the joy of heaven," says the modern thinker, but intelligence can neither feel, think, nor act. Our good, earnest friend says so because it appears so to him.

This subject is of such vast, incalculable importance to mankind that the apathy and indifference manifested in it, haunts me continually; and it appears strange that so little attention is given to it. We all earnestly desire the rapid advancement of our glorious philosophy. Able writers and speakers explain it. It is as clear and evident as the golden rule. Why is it not accepted more generally? Why is not the golden rule generally practiced? Because people do not want to. Well, they do not want Spiritualism. Here intelligence is as clear as can be, but that intelligence is not wanted. The brightest pupil of Socrates was Alcibiades. His intelligence did not save him from disgrace and ruin. The intelligence of the great philosopher, Bacon, whom Byron pronounced "The wisest and meanest of mankind," did not save him. Lucifer, with all his intelligence, could not stay in heaven. Intelligence seems a poor savior.

"Thrice armed is he who hath his quarrel just." He who has Truth for his support need not fear. I am like the fabled lamb on the wall who railed at the wolf. "It is the wall that speaks," replied the wolf. I have conversed with many, and written to leaders of thought, and in but a single instance have my statements been controverted.

Under the cloud of this great misconception, namely, that knowledge is the guide, director and regulator of all human affairs, the great body of the people can make no more rapid advance in Spiritualism than if being done. Knowledge deals with means for the satisfaction of desire, which must be prior to knowledge. Were there no desire or other feeling, there would be no need of intelligence, for there would be no motive to act, and there could be no action without means, the devising and applying of which is the use of intelligence. While we always exercise freedom of the will we are never free moral agents, because moral implies feeling, and choosing is a matter of intelligence; the moral agency is a matter of feeling. The agency is not free; it is determined by the character of the feeling.

I recently attended an exhibition of physical spirit manifestations through the mediumship of Anna Eva Fay, in Kansas City, in the presence of an audience of about 2,000 people. I was particular to notice the state of feeling manifested by the assemblage of spectators. Curiosity and love of novelty drew them to this exhibition, just as they would be drawn to an exhibition of a sleight-of-hand performance. A committee of three men chosen by the audience was on the stage of the theater to detect any fraud. A handkerchief taken from one of the committee, after being magnetized by the medium, was thrown on the floor in a heap. Miss Fay stepped away some ten feet and commanded the handkerchief to come to her. It immediately, in a twisted form rose to its full length, moved to her, not leaving the floor, and keeping time with the music. This feat brought out a tremendous applause and great hilarity.

The significance of it? Not one in a hundred ever thought of it, judging by its effects on the assembly. It was fun; and the laugh was loud and long. That was all. A wooden-bottomed chair with a small piece of board and a nail, was placed in the cabinet with Miss Fay and a committeeman. Soon strokes like those of a hammer driving a nail, were heard, and instantly the chair was brought out with the board nailed to it. Well, that was curious; that was all there was to it. No one seemed to think what it meant.

The conduct of a people is a reflex of their mental condition—an outward expression of the indwelling spirit. There is a force, a conscious, persistent desire to enjoy, to be happy. If the desire be good, the act to which it gives rise will be good. If it be bad, the act prompted by it will be bad. This is a fundamental law of human conduct. It is as follows: Man employs every means in his power, and pursues every interest which he feels (and therefore thinks) will satisfy his strongest desires, and best promote his welfare, present and future; and avoids as best he can, those evils which he fears will bring him pain or misery. What that conduct is, is determined by the character of the feeling that gives rise to it. No one can escape the action of this law.

Spiritualism is a higher phase of human nature. It has its rise in the spiritualized man. When spiritual aspiration is dominant Spiritualism dominates the life. Says A. J. Davis: "Absolute purity of heart and life is the richest of human possessions, and its only method of attainment is implicit obedience to the highest intuitions of the soul.

Purity of life demands purity of feeling. If the dominant feelings be justice, benevolence, and spiritual aspiration, the conditions will be just, benevolent and spiritual. If the dominant feelings be selfish and sensuous, the conduct will be selfish and sensuous. There can be no change of conduct without a change of feeling.

How, then, can progress be made in the advancement of Spiritualism? Our Puritan ancestors were not prepared to accept it. They punished Quakers and hanged mediums. The law of Moses, "Suffer not a witch to live," was their law. Spiritualism is now accepted—by a few, and rejected by the many, because they are not sufficiently spiritualized—not because they lack intelligence; they reject it because they do not want it; they don't feel that way.

Jesus said: "Seek and ye shall find;" but there must be a desire to possess the thing sought for. That desire is the mainspring of all human conduct. No one seeks Spiritualism until he desires it. The most effectual way to develop that desire is to properly educate the young. It is far easier to learn anew than to unlearn what has been learned amiss. The errors of the adult, form a well nigh effectual barrier to spiritual advancement.

DR. PHELON'S LETTER.

Brief Notes on Various Matters of Interest.

While every successive issue of The Progressive Thinker is a gem, there are occasional jewels with unequaled lustre. Amongst the last named, to a stranger in a strange land, comes No. 664. The feuilleton article of that paper, entitled "Mercy and Spirituality," cannot be bettered, and the make-up of the whole paper is in alignment and harmonious. It is a curious thing, that there is but one of a kind, on the earth at the same time. Nor do we forget that the paper and its incomparable editor are one.

Like bees upon the clover, so have the Knights of Pythias, claiming for themselves that mutual friendship which would dare to die for another, come and gone. It is no difficulty for San Francisco, the mistress of the Western Sea, to hospitably entertain, anywhere from 10,000 to 75,000 visitors and not feel very much crowded. Give us a week's notice and we'll feed half the continent. They can sleep out of doors without any discomfort. The K. of P. are made up of the bone and sinew of the country, which keep the business and educational facilities of all kinds constantly in motion. The great majority of them are thus the typical American citizen. There are two points of criticism, appearing to one knowing nothing of the interior workings. One is the overshadowing of military drill in Hardee's tactics, with the dominant physical this must always cultivate. There are always enough nurseries for the horrors of war, in the world. Why should we, even in an amateur way, add to them. The other criticism is, they do not admit ladies to any but a morganatic membership. They have a fenced-off corner for themselves and are Rathbone Sisters. I do not favor any movement, in this age of the world, that does not admit both man and woman on an equal footing.

The illumination of the city was the finest thus far attempted. The electricians who have the matter in charge, are evidently not averse to learning from experience. The State at large has no need to blush for the artistic and lavish way in which the freedom of the city was offered to these companions and friends. No unseemly overt act stained the record of their visit.

The one thing that has thrilled the whole city with horror, was the sudden passing of Chas. Fair and his wife. It is but a short time since the settlement of the Fair estate, which has been in litigation for years, withdrew a rich plum from the lawyer's grasp. But once more the heavens are darkened, as the birds of prey are once again flying thither, with their beaks sharpened by experience, to seize what the law may permit of the wealth of the multi-millionaires concerned in the fight. The "Fair Estate" has come to be synonymous with a plucked bird of any description. To one unaccustomed to automobile sport, it seems almost suicidal to drive a machine of that kind at the rate of 75 miles an hour, with only a rubber tire between the rider and death. But they have paid the penalty. The suffering and needy have lost a staunch and generous benefactress in Mrs. Fair. The city of San Francisco has been bereft, in Mr. Fair, of a hand ever ready and open for all public improvements.

A little earthquake called on us, and left its card. It was one of the rolling kind. As it was here only fifteen seconds, we hardly knew it had come, before it had gone. The disturbing thing about an earthquake is, we can never tell how long it may choose to abide with us. The longer it stays, the more unendurable it becomes.

Captain George Walrond, of Denver, Colorado, is in this city, seeking by rest and quiet to woo back the health and strength which overwork and the strain of business have robbed him of. Nervous prostration flows glibly from the tongue; but it is not so easy to meet and overcome, no matter how strong our wills may be. The Captain's friends are everywhere and all desire for him a speedy and complete return to health.

The sounds and signs from our summer Camps, begin to tell in tones not to be misunderstood, that our various workers, who have been doing yeoman's service in the various fields of labor, are seriously thinking of an early return to their homes and the renewal of incessant, unstinted labor in behalf of the cause we love so truly and so tenderly. It is to be hoped that the restful change of the summer will bring them back to us, with renewed life and forceful vigor.

There is one thing that seems strange to a newcomer in this state. It is the almost universal devotion of all classes to the fateful decision of Chance. It comes straight enough, too, for the old mining days were almost entirely devoid of any scientific knowledge of where one might expect to find the metal whose yellow has tinged the golden poppy, the flower emblem of California. Not being able to work out the problem of where it might be found, by the use of the factors of geological formation, there remained but one other way, the personal searching or prospecting. This, too, was as uncertain as the turn of a card. A poor man to-day, and fabulously rich to-morrow, or the reverse. But the conditions of the chances have tinged the business of the whole country. There are more rash, rank, speculative movements floated here than in any other part of the Union. A man buys a farm or ranch. He may buy a gold mine. He buys a gold mine, and it turns out to be a sand lot, if he chooses to furnish water, the wilderness is sure to blossom as the rose. So in the quietest times, there is always the wild, throbbing beat of speculative impulse. That is California.

CHRISTIAN RELIGION

Fifth Edition—Revised, with Much Additional Matter in Appendix

A standard and reliable history of the earlier period of the church, giving facts that are not found in the so-called histories written by churchmen. This latest edition has been carefully and thoroughly revised, and it is a reliable magazine of facts, such as the honest inquirer wants. THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,

(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. R. FRANCIS.

DR. G. E. WATKINS,

THE WONDERFUL

CHRONIST.

John King, M. D., the great writer and authority on Chronic Diseases, says that a Chronist is one who cures CHRONIC DISEASE. This being the case, then Dr. Watkins is certainly a CHRONIST, because he CURES chronic disease. Does not doctor, patch up, but cures. Do you desire to be cured? Let us reason together. You have been suffering for years trying this "Doctor," and that "Physician," and in spite of strong, drastic drugs given to you in toxic doses you still live. Well, this fact should teach you that nature is stronger than disease. This being the case, now, don't you think if some one who has been a closer student of nature than you have, should teach you what nature wants you to do to get well, that it would help you to recover your health? And then again, if you should place yourself in the hands of a Chronist, who uses only nature's remedies and laws to to cure disease, don't you think you would have a better chance to get well? Let us see what Dr. Watkins says about nature being the real Physician. Let us see what a Chronist who cures Chronic disease says. Remember, kind friend, that these words are the words of a regular Graduate of Medicine, but who was never guilty of trying to make nature obey the medical books and the opinions of medical men, but are the words of one who is now only a Student of nature. Write him today for his book on Chronic Disease which will be sent you free.

Vicksburg Camp, Mich.

Friday was children's day and early in the forenoon groups of children from both town and camp were waiting the lyceum hour. At 10 a. m. all were in their places and joined in singing—

"Our lyceum 'tis of thee, sweet band of liberty,
Of thee we sing,
Band where our songs resound
Band where no creeds are found,
But deeds of love abound and pleasures bring.

"God bless our little band,
Firm may it ever stand,
Stand for the right;
May all we say and do,
May all our teachings show
Our sympathy for woe, our search for light."

After singing, groups were formed with Dr. Conger, Mrs. Thurston and Miss Jeanette Fraser as leaders, and an interesting conversation followed on subjects suggested by the children.

At the same time a group of adult members conversed on the topic "How shall we bring the children into the beautiful truths of Spiritualism?"

C. J. Barnes gave an interesting talk to the little ones.

Mrs. Thurston also talked pleasantly to them and the lyceum adjourned for dinner.

At two o'clock the friends assembled to listen to a program by the children, after which the children were invited on the lawn, where a long table was set and ice cream and cake were served.

The remainder of the afternoon was spent in playing games and all took their departure with happy faces.

A very interesting conference was held Saturday forenoon, subject: "How can we continue in the soul illumination that we sometimes feel when we come in touch with the higher and better forces of nature?"

Mr. and Mrs. Kates came into our midst at the afternoon session, bringing greetings from Grand Ledge camp, and although they had been traveling and belated, they brought spiritual strength and truths to all who had the pleasure of listening.

A musical and literary program was presented in the evening which did credit to the camp.

Mrs. Kates assisted with vocal solos and Mr. Kates with pleasing stories and recitations.

Miss Amy Pellet, who has been our pianist for several seasons, won great applause for the masterly manner in which she brought forth sweet and harmonious tones from the piano.

Others who assisted were Misses Hazel Thurston, Gladys Olney, Cora Fuller, Mesdames Himebaugh and Russell.

Our third Sunday dawned a perfect day, and there was a stir in the camp at an early hour, for every room and tent was occupied and extra beds had been made wherever there was room.

A large crowd assembled for the morning exercises, which were opened with a solo by Mrs. Kates, entitled, "We're Passing But Once This Way." After rendering one of Lizzie Doten's poems, "It Won't Pay," Mr. Kates launched into his lecture on "Reforms of Spiritualism" in a forcible and thoughtful manner, impressing his hearers with a desire to be right and to do right.

The people continued to pass inside the gate till fully one thousand were in attendance at the afternoon meeting.

Miss Mildred Fletcher sang the opening song in a very pleasing manner.

Mr. Kates again recited from Lizzie Doten's poems, "Chemistry of Character." Mrs. Kates followed with her lecture, subject, "And, lo, the stone was rolled away." The idea as expressed was that the stone of selfishness, the stone of bigotry was rolled away from our own lives, and if we would put her teachings into practice in our daily lives we would be the better for having heard them.

At the close of the lecture, Mrs. Russell sang in her soulful way, "The Old Musician's Harp."

Mrs. Kates then gave convincing descriptions for fully an hour.

Mr. Kates occupied the platform again in the evening.

Thus has the third Sunday of our meeting passed away.

Charles Barnes has returned to his home at Marion, Ind.

Dr. Ellsworth, of Benton Harbor, was a guest at the hotel Sunday.

G. A. Letford visited camp a few days last week.

Miss Murphy, palmist, has returned to her home in Marshall.

Mrs. Beach has returned to Battle Creek.

Among Sunday visitors from Battle Creek were Mesdames Platt, Estelle, Barry and Yale, Messrs. Estelle and Yale.

Mr. and Mrs. Canfield, of LaGrange, Ind., were guests at the hotel this week.

Mr. and Mrs. Hoat, of Wayland, spent Sunday in camp.

Miss Mildred Fletcher, of Ypsilanti; Mrs. H. E. Blue and daughter, Dorothy, of Jennings; Miss Campbell, of Kalamazoo, and Miss Nettie Allen, of the village, have been the guests of Miss Mabel Fraser this week.

Dr. Rosa Conger has returned to her home in Chicago.

CORA FULLER.

Sycamore Grove Camp, Cal.

This camp opened auspiciously, Sunday, August 17. The day was pleasant, and harmony, enthusiasm and cordial greeting emanated from the large crowd in attendance. The opening morning service was a mosaic of musical selections, and brief welcoming and introductory address from W. J. Williams, the president; Mrs. Freitag, the pastor of the Harmonial Association of Los Angeles; Mrs. R. S. Lillie, Mrs. E. Lowe Watson and Mrs. R. Cowell, respectively, Mrs. Watson concluding her remarks with an original poem.

The children's lyceum, a pleasing feature of this camp, was held at 1 p. m., and the little ones acquitted themselves extremely well in recitation, song, etc.

At 2:30 p. m., Mrs. Watson gave one of the fine inspirational discourses for which she is famous, to an audience where standing room was at a premium. What Does Spiritualism Stand For? was the theme.

At 7:30 Mrs. Lillie addressed another large gathering, taking her subject from the audience—"Does Occult Science Hold the Key to Our Divine Heritage?" Again Spiritualism was the theme, and Mrs. Lillie was in fine inspiration, and handled the subject to the evident satisfaction and approval of the large audience. Mrs. Freitag closed the meeting with one of her famous ballot test seances, and maintained her reputation, and so ended the first day of the camp-meeting.

The beginning justifies the prediction made in my former letter concerning the prospect of an unusually good camp-meeting this year.

By the way, in publishing my account of Harmony Grove camp, in speaking of the notes of the various wild birds heard on that camp-ground, you make me say "whip-poor-will" quite against my will. We never hear that bird on this coast, and its only representative is said to be the bird of which I spoke, viz., the poor-will, so called from its cry, the same as the whip-poor-will is named from its peculiar note. I heard one say, once, in reference to these two birds, that ours is more sympathetic than the eastern bird, for while that one lugubriously commands poor Will to be whipped, ours cries out with a pitying wail, "Poor Will!" I have very seldom heard it, and then only in the more secluded hill regions of Southern California.

ELLA WILSON MARCHANT.

Lake Brady Camp, O.

Sunday, August 17, was German Day at Lake Brady. Everything favored the management; the day was perfect, the attendance large, and nearly every number on the long program was given. The morning session was shortened somewhat as the train bringing the Cleveland delegation was a little late. The music for the day was furnished by Prof. Graban, Miss Clara Graban, Mr. H. Ruges, consisting of zither, mandolin and guitar; was fine and enjoyed by all.

The president of the German society of Cleveland, C. F. Hunger, was chairman of the occasion. Mrs. Gertrude Heinsohn, Mr. W. H. French, Mr. Carl Sollinger, Mr. J. E. Pope and Mr. Bernhard Zeuner were the speakers of the day. The mediums who gave the spirit messages were Mrs. A. E. Moore, Miss Edith Buchwald and Mr. W. H. French. Both German and English were given so all could share in the feast of spiritual food. Harmony and good will prevailed throughout the day, and many good wishes were expressed for the future success of the Lake Brady camp.

MARY L. BETTES.

The Freeville Camp.

The Central New York Spiritualist Association closed its camp on Sunday, August 17, with the largest meeting of the season, when B. L. Robinson, M. D., of McLean, N. Y., addressed the morning session in a finely presented discourse on "Individuality," and Mrs. Mary E. Lease spoke to an appreciative audience in the afternoon, on the subject, "I am captain of my soul."

The programme has been one of unusual interest, including among its speakers and mediums, Miss Lizzie Harlow, Haydenville, Mass.; Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Chicago, Ill.; Charles E. Dane, Lowell, Mass.; Mrs. Lizzie Brewer, Syracuse, N. Y.; H. D. Barrett, Boston, Mass.; H. W. Richardson, East Aurora, N. Y.; Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds, Troy, N. Y.; J. T. Morrison, Ithaca, N. Y.; Rev. W. A. Smith, Groton, N. Y.; Miss Victoria C. Moore, Dryden, N. Y.; B. L. Robinson, M. D., McLean, N. Y.; W. Rawson, Philadelphia, Pa.; Mrs. Mary E. Lease, New York City.

The musical part of the program was one of the interesting features; both mirth-provoking and soul-inspiring music was rendered by the Parker-Bowens. Miss Mabel Stone, of Freeville, also added much to the enjoyment of the audiences by her delightfully rendered vocal selections.

On State Day, Friday, Aug. 8, President H. W. Richardson, Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds and Mrs. Brewer addressed the audience. Mrs. Rawson, of Philadelphia, gave several vocal selections, and Miss Victoria Moore recited.

On National Day, Friday, August 15, President H. D. Barrett delivered an eloquent address, presenting in a most forceful manner the duties of Spiritualists, and the necessity of organized effort.

The officers elected for the ensuing year are, President, B. Rhoades, Elmira, N. Y.; first vice-president, Mrs. Jennie McNeil, Tully, N. Y.; second vice-president, Mrs. B. C. Myers, Harford Mills, N. Y.; treasurer, W. E. Sutfin, Freeville, N. Y.; secretary, Miss Victoria C. Moore, Dryden, N. Y.

A two weeks' session will be held next year, opening the first Saturday in August. The association is anticipating a most interesting and prosperous session. VICTORIA C. MOORE, Dryden, N. Y. Secretary.

Vegetarianism and the Bible.

The Vegetarian is, in its way, an odd sort of a paper. It advocates the principles indicated by its name, but it does so in the name of God and the Bible, and its editor hails from the Congregationalist Memorial Hall in Farringdon street. Now the Bible is anything but a vegetarian book, and the Bible God is a sort of a cannibal. At the very outset the Bible represents God as being approached by two worshipers. These were the first two men born in the world—for Adam was not born, but manufactured. Their names were Cain and Abel. The former was an agriculturist or market-gardener; the latter was a shepherd. Each built an altar on which he offered a gift to the Lord. But the Lord, instead of treating them equally, since each offered what he had, turned up his divine nose at Cain's peas and potatoes, and greedily accepted Abel's roast lamb. Then there were ructions, as was natural. This bloody quarrel was the first in the world, and it was entirely caused by the Lord's preference for meat over vegetables. Indeed, he would not even have a mixed diet; it was meat first and last, and vegetables nowhere. All through the Bible we have the smell of meat—often overdone. The Bible God's temple at Jerusalem was a perfect shambles, reeking with blood, and echoing with the groans of slaughtered animals. And when we come to the New Testament we find all the sanguinary characteristics of the Old Testament gathered up and sublimated in the disgusting doctrine of salvation by the Blood of Christ. Altogether, to use the words of Othello, it is "Blood, blood, blood!" from one end to the other of "Holy Writ." Yet it is in the name of this God and this Bible that our contemporary advocates Vegetarianism. No wonder that such a logical journal sees some subtle connection between Spanish bull-fights and the Continental Sunday, and advises Englishmen to hold on to their good old-fashioned and miserable Sabbath. One wonders, though, after all, what on earth (or elsewhere) the Sunday question has to do with Vegetarianism.—Freethinker.

Epilepsy Cured.

At Last a Positive and Permanent Cure for This Terrible Maladay Is Discovered.

The renowned Brain and Nerve Specialist, Dr. Charles W. Green, of Battle Creek, Mich., has at last found a positive cure for Epilepsy, or Fits.

Epilepsy has baffled the medical world since the time of Hippocrates, and not until the Eminent Specialist, Dr. Green, patiently worked out his great cure has a positive cure for Epilepsy been known. The Doctor has used it in every case of fits he has treated in the past five years, hundreds of whom had tried everything they could hear of before taking his treatment, and he has yet to find the case, not due to injury, that it will not cure.

Mrs. Lizzie Green, of Boston, says: I cannot thank you enough for my deliverance from that terrible disease, Epilepsy. I had suffered with it for thirty years and had tried everything I could hear of, but the attacks only grew harder and more frequent. I had given up all hope when one of my neighbors told me of your great cure. I should not have written this if she had not urged me, for I had been fooled so often that I had resolved to pay out no more money. God bless her for urging me for you cured me and saved me from a life worse than death." Do not experiment longer with "Free Cures" and worthless nostrums containing injurious hypnotics, etc., but write at once to Dr. Charles W. Green, 214 Monroe St., Battle Creek, Mich., for full particulars of this great and tried remedy. It will cure you and lighten the end of your life. Write at once giving full facts about your case; the doctor will tell you exactly what can be done for you. Remember the treatment is positively guaranteed.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

The book will at once appeal to the reason of every reader, and leave him more amazed than ever at the prevalence of the theory of Creation." The Two has always been a fateful number. Free Thought Ideal says: "We found it full of glittering thoughts for thinkers, and the very death warrant of Christian superstition shines upon its pages." Price 75 cents.

EDUCATION.

New Needs Demand New Means.

A new science demands new words. Modern Spiritualism is the latest child born, and its demands are innumerable. It demands new words, new literature, new ethics, new politics, a new college, and almost everything new. It is causing a general revolution. The church, that most wonderful power in all history, is being rebuilded by the influence of Modern Spiritualism. It puts a new face on science. The term education, from Spiritualism is receiving a new wealth of meaning. It now includes every breath, thought, home influence, scholastic instruction, association, vocation, etc., from the cradle to the grave.

The past idea of education was, learning. The present is, development. It means character building and a better citizenship. It discourages memorizing only in its parrot sense. It recognizes memory as one of the most useful of all the faculties. It would develop reason, logic, and understanding, not only in the grown children but in the young children. It would not make the acquisition of knowledge so easy as to require no effort. The kindergarten, from four to seven years, is the exception.

Germany is complaining of too many university graduates without positions for them. Let that philosophic people correct the university curriculum and the remedy will be at hand. No one can know too much if the knowledge is right. The commonest service can be better done, for a college degree, if the instruction is practical.

The Spiritualist college has not been started a moment too soon. Great thanks and all honor to Moses Hull for being the first to perceive the new need of the intercommunication discovery. History will do him justice. History will also make Morris Pratt a conspicuous pedestal. Two nobler and more unselfish men it is difficult to find. The Psychical Research Society has done good. The Spiritualist college will do very much more good.

Morality will be no longer taught as a study separate and a part. The entire curriculum will be morality itself. Morality is of the feelings. Religion is intellectual. The new educational psychology teaches the feelings and intellect equally. Thus no sect or religion is any longer taught distinctively. Religion expresses man's relation to his maker. If the flower had a maker, man has. The intelligence, magnetism, force, and all the myriad elements of nature made the flower. From the same source man came. The flower has no religion because it lacks intelligence to understand its origin. Man is developed to the requisite intelligence. Through his greater mental development he learns the great relation. Religion belongs to the higher understanding. Now and then there is expressed a dislike of the word. The objection is against the old meaning, not the new. It is a strong word. Through all the church evolutions the word survives. A more appreciative term may yet be found. The reformed education is so inwrought with the essence of all that makes up a true religion that its separate teaching in a college would be a waste of time and a superfluity. Should a student ask for knowledge specially about it, whether in the class room or elsewhere, it should be honestly given.

Clara Stewart says in The Progressive Thinker of May 31, "I have been told several times since coming to Whitewater, that if the Spiritualist college can be redeemed from the stigma of Atheism that has threatened it, the citizens would gladly support it."

Spiritualism, when correctly known, will be found to be in no sense Atheistic. It has only found a better definition of God. It has changed it from the supernatural to natural.

The profound scientists agree on this change. The progressive Christian churches are gradually accepting it. Changing this definition should not be called Atheism. The Christians changed the definition from omnipotent anger to universal love; and it did not make them Atheists. The N. S. A., in a formal way, has declared its belief in Infinite Intelligence. This surely is not Atheism. None better than the thorough scientist understands the all-intelligence of nature. This all-intelligence of nature and the N. S. A. Supreme Intelligence are one.

The extreme radical Spiritualists are noble, honest, self-sacrificing and very useful agitators, but not successful organizers. There are exceptions, as in all other rules. When the radical becomes convinced of no more necessity for agitation, he changes and then becomes a first-class organizer. He exhibits a thoroughness and painstaking talent that is marvelous. When his iconoclastic work is done, he commences to build and thus continues his great usefulness. Up to this time the radical has been the most important member of the profession.

Moses Hull was at one time quite a radical. It was when all the world was at war, not only with Moses but all of the Spiritualists. When the war practically ceased, Moses had the wisdom to cease, to change his tactics, and keep on doing good. To be a conservative means to conserve all that is useful and beautiful in the old as well as in the new. This is what Moses Hull is now.

The late reform in education develops a wonderfully new and interesting and useful knowledge of the human instincts. Man has more instincts than any of the lower animals. Reason is the outgrowth of the instinct of curiosity. All of the higher faculties have their roots in the instincts.

"Do not break a colt, but teach him," never before possessed such a wealth of meaning as now. Happiness, of itself, does not create knowledge. A correct knowledge of the laws of feeling and mind creates solid, useful and permanent happiness. Were this teaching left alone to the spirits, it has been proved they would be successful, but only here and there with single and peculiar individuals.

Let the glorious work the spirits have done keep right on, and in the same good old way. Many can they reach in this way that could not otherwise avail themselves of any opportunity. No wise spirit will disdain any and all the aid the mortal world can contribute in addition to their own ambitious efforts. He knows, that in the last analysis knowledge and education are man's savior. The Morris Pratt Institute would only do what it can in this way.

The Spiritualist college curriculum, appearing in No. 663 of The Progressive Thinker, is, in my opinion, excellent. From my viewpoint the college has already conferred a lasting benefit. No one most immediately connected with the institution would think of claiming that it would not continue to improve as time goes on.

Ex-president Patton, of Princeton, says, "It is time for college authorities to realize that young men nowadays do not go to college to become scholars, but to get a broadening view of life, a certain training and a store of memories that will last them all through life. Time and money and men are being wasted in the effort to make scholars out of men who did not come to college to become scholars." This illustrates the great progress the orthodox college has already made. It still lacks, and will ever lack the most important department, as long as it remains orthodox.

Change is one of the principles of time. I have changed my location from Verona to Madison.

SPEAK TENDERLY.

"Speak tenderly. For he is dead." We say:
"With gracious hand smooth all his roughened past,
And fullest measure of reward forecast;
Forgetting naught that gloried his brief day."
Yet when the brother who, along our way—
Prone with his burdens, heart-worn in the strife—
Falters before us, how we search his life,
Censure, and sternly punish while we may.
Oh, weary are the paths of earth, and hard,
And living hearts alone are ours to guard.
At least, begrudge not then the sore distraught
The reverent silence of our pitying thought,
Life, too, is sacred; and he best forgives
Who says: "He errs, but—tenderly—he lives."

THE "MYSTERY."

A Horrible-scope Portrayed.

To the Editor:—I notice an article from Dr. R. Greer asking you who the Blissful Prophet is, connected with the Magazine of Mysteries. I would like to ask you the same questions, who are they? Do you know?

I subscribed for the Magazine of Mysteries, but the only mystery I can see about it is in connection with the people or mystics who run it; they call themselves the Mystic Brotherhood, and go by numbers; each brother has a different number, withholding their names every time.

Now, why should anybody who pretends to work for the good of man be ashamed to give his name? The Magazine is simply bosh; it savors of old-time Churchianity. It looks to me as though they were a pack of ministers or priests, perhaps. They publish a magazine that is nothing but church humbug in it from beginning to end.

With my subscription came my horoscope, or horrible-scope, that is given free to every new subscriber by giving your date of birth. Well, among other things they told me that I had no respect for religion and must go to church regularly in order to develop everything high in my make-up, as there was danger of my becoming low (morally speaking, I suppose) if I did not go. Well, if they had reference to the so-called church religion with their deified men for gods, I must admit I have long ceased to have any more respect for that holy traffic, as that is all it amounts to anyhow, and if I have to go to church among a lot of pretenders to develop morality (providing I did not have any according to their way of thinking), the Gods deliver me.

Now, I would like to meet that brotherhood which is giving me such godly advice, and see who they are and what their true private life is. I do not want people talking and advising me from behind the statue of Jesus and St. Peter; that day has gone by. I want those brothers to crawl out of their holes, and let us see who they are and if they do not crawl out they will be dug out by the press. The people have progressed too far to be hoodwinked by any more such people or Blissful Prophets. Let those fellows crawl from behind that magazine, and show themselves, and let me take a good look at them. We Spiritualists do not have any "mysteries." Everything is natural law with us, and when we publish our books and magazines we are not afraid to publish our names with them.

I thank the higher forces for drawing me to Spiritualism, and, away from church idolatry and pure humbug, and as Dr. Greer says, never to return to it again.

I wish those brothers could enjoy as much love for the good, noble and true that I do; then they would not have to write under a half-dozen different numbers and nom-de-plumes to hide their true selves. MRS. COLLEEN.

PHILOSOPHY OF EPICTETUS.

Compared with the "New Thought" of the Present Day.

It is claimed by most people that the principles underlying the philosophy of Christian, Mental and Divine Science, as well as the more specific teachings of their founders and disciples are new, and so may come under the general term, New Thought. But should dissenters from this assumption need corroboration of the wise Solomon's much quoted declaration, "There is no new thing under the sun," let them study Epictetus, a philosopher of the first century, originally a slave.

The following excerpts from the words of this philosopher of nature may furnish food for serious "new thought" for many students of Mental Science. I say philosopher of nature, because Epictetus was not a product of scholastic lore nor collegiate training, nor even a common grammar school, but obtained the glittering gems of truth that flash from his wit, wisdom and satire, by attuning himself to Nature's harmonies and opening every gate of self or individual concept that shut him away—in consciousness—from the recognition of the Absolute, or the Universal Oneness.

The most widely quoted Mental Scientists of to-day teach the doctrine that we are not so much affected by our environments as we are by our attitude towards them. But this idea cannot be considered in any sense new, for Epictetus said, "It is not things but the opinions about the things, that trouble mankind. Thus death is not terrible; if it were so it would have appeared so to Socrates. But the opinion we have about death, that it is terrible, that is wherein the terror lieth."

Again, "It is not he that strikes, or he that reviles, that doeth any man an injury, but the opinion about these things, that they are injurious. When then someone may provoke thee to wrath, know that it is thine own conception which hath provoked thee."

And this, "For none other shall hurt you, if you yourself choose it not, but you shall be hurt then when you conceive yourself to be so."

Can Christian Scientists ask for a better or clearer statement of their faith than the above?

Once again, "Has some one lost his property, or his wife or child? Look to it then, be not carried away by appearances. It is not the thing itself that afflicts man, since there are others whom it does not afflict, but the opinion he has about it."

It seems from the following that even our sordid, selfish, scheming commercialism is not new: "We follow our business as in a great Fair. Cattle and horses are brought to be sold; and the greater part of the men and women come, some to buy, some to sell; and few are they who come for the spectacle of the Fair."

At a certain time one said to Epictetus: "I wish to do good to men." The philosopher answered: "What good? What wilt thou do? Hast thou done good to thyself? Do not chatter to them, but show them in thyself what manner of men philosophy can make."

For those who never come to the point, but they must first "beat the devil around the bush," he has this sharp cut: "Never when I wish to take a piece of bread, do I lay hold of a broom, but I always go to the bread as to a mark." * * "Which of you, desiring to go to the bath, ever went into a mill?"

Orthodox Spiritualists will find the tenets of their belief at least hinted at, as follows: "What is death? A bugbear. Turn it around; examine it; see, it does not bite. Now or later, that which is body must be parted from that which is spirit, as formerly it was parted. Why, then, hast thou indignation if it be not now; it will be later." And this: "For to what end think you are ears of corn produced? Is it not that they may become dry and parched? For it is not to exist for themselves that they come into the world. So understand that for men it is a curse not to die, just as not to be ripened and not to be reaped." * * "Has another man's child died, or his wife? Who is there that will not say it is the lot of humanity? But when his own may die, then straightway it is, Alas! wretched that I am. But we should bethink ourselves what we felt on hearing of others in the same plight."

One asked of Epictetus: "What if one come and find me alone and slay me?" The philosopher answered: "Fool not thee, but thy body. Thou art soul bearing up a corpse."

Once more for my Spiritualist friends: "God has placed at every man's side a guardian, who is charged to watch over him; a genius that cannot sleep nor be deceived. So, when ye have shut the doors, and made darkness in the house, remember never to say that ye are alone, but God is there, and your guardian is there; and what need have these of light to mark what ye are doing."

For the benefit of agnostics, or those who believe in destiny, our ancient philosopher gives a crumb in the following: "In setting out on a voyage, what is it possible for me to do? This, to choose the captain, crew, the day, the opportunity. Then a tempest has burst upon us; but what doth it concern me? I have left nothing undone that was mine to do; the problem is now another's to-wit: the captain's. But now the ship is sinking, and what have I to do? I do only what I am able—drown without terror and screaming and accusing of God, but knowing that that which has come into being must also perish. Like the hour, I must arrive, and like the hour, pass away. What, then, can it matter to me how I pass from mortal view; whether by drowning or by fever? For pass I must by some such thing."

Epictetus clearly comprehended things at their real value. His mind penetrated the so-called intrinsic value of houses, lands and chattels. He fully realized that all forms of matter are only materializations or conditions of an etheric substance, everywhere present, and that real ownership of anything is an illusion of the senses. Note the following: "Each thing that allures the mind or offers an advantage or is loved by you, remember and speak of it as it is, from the smallest thing upward. If you love an earthen jar, then think I love an earthen jar, for so you shall not be troubled when it breaks. And when you kiss your child or wife, think, I kiss a mortal; and so shall you not be troubled when they die." And what can we imagine finer than this: "Never in any case have I lost anything, but I have returned it. Is thy child dead? It is returned. Is thy wife dead? She is returned. Art thou deprived of thy estate? Is not this also returned? But one answers, 'He is wicked who deprives me of my estate.' What is that to thee, through whom the Giver demands his own. As long, therefore, as he grants it to thee, steward it like another's property, as travelers use an inn."

If the time shall ever come when the following injunction of this more than sage shall be heeded, then indeed will the earth be redeemed and glorified; "That which thou wouldst not suffer thyself seek not to lay upon others, thou wouldst not be a slave, look to it that others be not a slave to thee. For if thou endure to have slaves, it seems that thou thyself art first of all a slave. For virtue hath no communion with vice, nor freedom with slavery."

There is yet another class of persons who are dissenters from Mental Science and Christian Science, although they have no Societies, papers or public teachers, who call their belief "The Science of Being." Their contention is: First, no evolution from lower to higher forms, but a never-ending operation of Infinite Life that does not practice nor learn by experience. It is not a prentice hand that must learn to do this or that. Second, that so-called illusion, mortal mind, error or mistakes are all real steps in the Divine Plan. That sickness, so-called disease and every physical deviation from our ideal is the operation of Divine Chemistry (Alchemy) in and upon substance, which is universally diffused, and that there is just as much plan and design of wisdom in a cancer or consumption as in Jupiter or the Pleiades.

And did not Epictetus write for these also? Hear him. A ruler said to Epictetus, "Woe is me for the Grecks are in peril. They will be slain by the Trojans and die." Epictetus answered, "And if the Trojans slay them not, wilt they not still die?" "Yea, but not altogether." "What then doth that matter, for if it is evil to die, it is alike evil to die together or to die one by one."

Those who hold to the Science of Being do not think that our thoughts cause sickness nor prolong or shorten life in the body. Epictetus seems to strengthen their position thus: "How seldom is it that a beggar is seen that is not an old man, and even of exceeding age? But freezing by night and day and lying on the ground and eating only what is barely necessary, they come near to being unable to die."

And again we have the corner stone of the Science of Being in "Seek not to have things happen as you choose them, but rather choose them to happen as they do, and so shall you live prosperously."

Once more and I have done. "But thou art a supreme object, thou art a piece of God, thou hast in thee something that is a portion of him. Why, then, art thou ignorant of thy high ancestry? Why knowest thou not whence thou comest? Wilt thou not remember, in thine eating, who it is that eats, and whom thou dost nourish? In cohabiting, who is it that cohabits? Knowest thou not that thou art nourishing a God? Exercising a God? Unhappy man! Thou bearest about with thee a God and knowest it not."

And now, taking our leave of Epictetus, it may be apropos to quote the last verse of a poem, "The New Name:"

And now the sixth sense is opened;
The seventh embraces the whole;
And clothed with the Oneness of Being
We acknowledge dominion of Soul.
And on thro' all of life's phases
And along all the paths to be trod,
We recognize only one power,
One Present, Omnipotent God."

Taxing Mediums.

For about two weeks I have been investigating the condition of Spiritualism in Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Omaha, Neb., and I find that there is a great work going on here in private development. There is a license in Omaha, not only on mediums, but any one adhering to the philosophy of Spiritualism can be fined from $5 to $20 if the Catholic mayor knows of it.

If the Spiritualists of Nebraska will furnish me legal defense, and stand by me, I am willing at any time to enter the fight, and test this license matter in the courts.

If different persons having a home circle for their development, with a fee, the city of Omaha can jail them indefinitely for it. I want to tackle those officials, but am not in a position financially to do so, but as soon as I am assured of backing, I am willing to open the ball.

This is a stab at individual liberty, and one fight would kill it dead, if one would go at it right.

I am stopping at 630 Mynster street, Council Bluffs, Iowa. There is a mediums' meeting every Sunday afternoon at Mrs. Rudd's house, cor 20th street and B avenue. I am ready to work in either Iowa or Nebraska, at points inside of 100 miles of either of these cities, giving lectures or test seances. Letters addressed to me at Council Bluffs, Iowa, will reach me.

SOME REFLECTIONS

On Certain Prominent Absurdities.

Brother Myrick is an intelligent gentleman and can preach such sweet, soothing words of comfort to those good sisters and mothers of his flock; that is very nice in a social view, but they should hear the truth, "Christ or no Christ."

The fall of man and total depravity and the atonement, in this 20th century, is too much. It puts me in mind of the man who was prosecuted for his dog's killing a farmer's sheep. He said his dog did not kill sheep, and it was impossible for his dog to have killed the sheep, and thirdly, he never had a dog. Even the Presbyterians are ashamed to preach infant damnation. All such isms die hard.

The school-house will soon bring the millennium; only keep out all religions that block the wheels of progression. Instead of churches, give us school-houses.

How the saints howled when Galileo demonstrated the earth was a globe and revolved around the sun. His reward—to be shut up in prison where he died 260 years ago.

Evolution moves slow, but it is sure.

There are only a few left who believe the old Bible story of creation.

Modern research will soon do away with the Moses in the bullrushes; the fable was old long before the days of Abraham, yet the bloodthirsty Moses, who caused the death of the nations of Canaan, has been the law-giver of Israelites and the whole Christian world since 1500 years before the Christian era.

"Thus saith the Lord" has caused more bloodshed than anything else. The spirit of persecution was handed down to the Christians, and they have been diligent in the service of the Lord. The earth has been drenched with the blood of its victims.

All religions have cursed the earth in all ages, and are yet active and anxious to do business at the old stand.

Infidels were persecuted.

I venerate the memory of that good man, Thomas Paine, who was vilified by the Christians, and his life made miserable because he had the manhood to speak the truth. "The world is my country, and to do good is my religion!" When he wrote to unite the colonies against the aggressions of England, he was a good man, but when he wrote the "Age of Reason," then Pray, Blanche and Sweetheart were turned loose. Ninety-eight years since his death.

We occasionally hear a few yelps from the pack, but it grows fainter. When the Jonathan Edwardses, Talmages, and many others are relegated to obscurity, Paine will be appreciated and stand high as one of the great men of America. "Above all things, give us religious liberty." It will be well for us to cherish and guard well his admonitions.

It will be a sad day when the holy ones get God in our Constitution. History repeats itself. The thumb-screw would surely follow. They have already cheated us out of fifty-two days in a year, for the glory of God. The railroads are great as civilizers. They are knocking the holiness out of the Sabbath at a 2:30 galt. Before another century rolls around there will be no holy days. Speed the day!

In most Christian countries they have their patron saints. The best saint of France was the Infidel Voltaire. He put a stop to the Holy Inquisition, and opened the Bastile.

More infidels and less saints will speed on the millennium.

Now, Brother Myrick, I have a few words to say about that precious Savior you have such faith in. Firstly, there was no Adam to sin. No occasion for blood-shedding. That is all on a par with the billy goat the Hebrews drove out of camp bearing their sins; one is as sensible as the other. It is only a relic of barbarism; you have not a particle of proof that any such man ever lived. Then it follows there was no "Holy Mary, mother of God," and the story of the immaculate conception was gotten up to make dupes of the people and fill their coffers.

The days of miracles have passed away. There never was one performed. You believe, and without proof.

The astonishing doings and sayings of Mollie Fancher are more mysterious than any you cited, and no one claims there is anything miraculous about Mollie's case.

I have another case that occurred under my own knowledge. It was during the Civil war, on the 6th day of April, 1862. Early in the morning my mother became very much distressed in spirit, and said there was a terrible battle raging, and she could hear the guns roar. She was thus agitated for nearly an hour, when the influence passed away. I marked the time, it was 6 a. m., the exact time when the battle of Shiloh was begun. Mother was 70 years of age, lived near Lake Erie, in Ohio, and Shiloh is in Southern Tennessee, nearly 500 miles away.

Was that a miracle?

No!

She was a medium, and heard clairaudiently. Those persons you cite were mediums, or one organ was developed at the expense of all the rest.

I knew an idiot who could remember where articles were put away for years, when forgotten by all others of the family, but that faculty was at the expense of all the rest. Animals and fowls prognosticate storms days in advance. It is mysterious, but not miraculous. The formation of our planet earth was not a miracle.

And the origin of life (although beyond the knowledge of man) is not miraculous, but the effect of law. As science advances, the belief in miracles will be relegated to the day when snakes and donkeys talked.

Brother Myrick, your letter covered a large field, I could only dig a little here and there. Perhaps I may have more to say in the future, a few more words now, and I am done. I deny the snake and rib stories; it's all a myth; the Christ, "Holy Mary, Mother of God" story is all myth. No such man ever died on the cross, and the fiction has cursed mankind for centuries. That fable of the repentant thief—I have not language to express its infernal effects. I was a big boy, 16 years old over 70 years ago, and am willing to learn.

CARDINAL MANNING.

His Views of the Catholic and Other Churches.

To the Editor:—His Eminence Cardinal Manning is, or was, one of the great lights of the Roman Catholic Church—one of the veritable representatives of St. Peter, consequently his utterances on church matters are presumed to be authoritative.

In 1888 he had a tilt with Gladstone, the great British premier.

In showing the increasing strength and importance of the "mother church," among other things he is credited with saying:

"In 1854, 350 bishops of all nations surrounded their Head when he defined the Immaculate Conception.

"In 1802, 400 bishops assembled at the canonization of the martyrs of Japan.

"In 1807, 500 bishops came to keep the 18th century of St. Peter's martyrdom.

"In 1870, 700 bishops assembled in the Vatican Council.

"On the Feast of the Epiphany [1870] the bishops of 30 nations during two whole hours made profession of faith in their own languages, kneeling before their head. Add to this, that in 1869, in the sacerdotal jubilee of Pius IX., Rome was filled for months by pilgrims from all lands in Europe and beyond the sea, from the Old World and from the New, bearing all manner of gifts and oblations to the Head of the Universal Church. To this, again, must be added the world-wide outcry and protest of all the Catholic unity against the seizure and sacrilege of September, 1870, when Rome was taken by the Italian Revolution.

"The same events have been reproduced in the time of Leo XIII. In the early months of 1888 Rome was once more filled with pilgrims of all nations, coming in thousands as representatives of millions in all nations, to celebrate the sacerdotal jubilee of the Sovereign Pontiff. These things are said because they set forth in the most visible and self-evident way the living unity and the luminous universality of the One Catholic and Roman Church."

"Every religion and every religious body known to history has varied from itself and broken up. Brahminism has given birth to Buddhism; Mahometanism is parted into the Arabian and European khalifates; the Greek schism into the Russian, Constantinopolitan, and Bulgarian autocephalous fragment; Protestantism into its multitudinous diversities. All have departed from their original type, and all are continually developing new and irreconcilable intellectual and ritualistic diversities and repulsions. How is it that, with all diversities of language, civilization, race, interest, and conditions, social and political, including persecution and warfare, the Catholic nations are at this day [1888], even when in warfare, in unchanged unity of faith, communion, worship and spiritual sympathy with each other and with their Head? This needs a rational explanation."

The great Cardinal sums up in this wise: "For the present it is enough to say that no human legislation, authority or constraint can ever create internal unity of intellect and will; and all that the diversities and contradictions generated by all human systems prove the absence of Divine authority. Variations or contradictions are proof of the absence of a Divine mission to mankind. All natural causes run to disintegration. Therefore they can render no account of the world-wide unity of the One Universal Church."

The "Protestants," who, however, have ceased to protest, at least audibly, can now see what a small figure they cut in the religious world; that is, according to the great Cardinal Manning.

This free country is a splendid field in which to spread the doctrines and dogmas of "our holy church." That the Catholic Church is gaining ground in free America it is useless to deny. New church buildings are being erected, and prosperity is evident on every hand. When we tell Protestants of the danger we are in, they pooh, pooh, us. Only a few days ago a new church building in the State of Illinois was finished at a cost of $36,000; and yet some of us are not "saved." C. H. MATHEWS.

Spiritualism and Religion.

There is a diversity of opinion as to Spiritualism—is it a religion or a science? Is religion a necessity? Yes, until reason and common sense are enthroned in place of priestcraft and superstition; until selfishness and ignorance are supplanted by truth and justice; until the ethics of the gospel of Jesus the Christ are lived and obeyed by those who teach in his name. Then will come the millenium, and religion will be a back number because hypocrisy will stand revealed and the charlatans who flourish and swagger so abundantly to-day will have gone to their reward. The Christian religion, as lived and practiced in this country and in Europe to-day is an awful fraud. Commercialism, Dowieism and Boodleism have emasculated the beautiful, democratic spirit of Christ's gospel, and in its place set up theocracy and imperialism.

The religion to teach and believe is, that man shall reap what he sows; that our dead are not dead, and that justice shall eventually prevail, and that priestcraft, boodleism, sophistry, Dowieism, and lying shall flee away.

I know there are two forces at work in the minds of men, and that my side is not the popular one at present, but I believe the spirit of truth and love is my guide; that I seek that which will endure if righteousness shall eventually prevail. H. E. POMEROY.

AN OCTOGENARIAN.

He Expresses His Views Very Forcibly.

It would seem that the dozen or more towns in Northern Texas, each containing from five to twenty-five thousand inhabitants, are doomed to be ignored by missionaries and lecturers. At the annual convention of the N. S. A. in October, 1901, two noted missionaries were appointed to the field work of Texas, which appointment inspired in us high hopes for the organizing of societies in the unorganized portion of the state. Through The Progressive Thinker we anxiously followed their movements in the East, thence to Cincinnati, O., and Little Rock, Ark., thence to Marshall, Texas, at one jump passing over two tiers of Texas counties to get in the swim among the big fish, organized societies, fine halls and splendid temples, etc., working a few weeks among organized societies in the Central and Southern part of the state, then comet-like, made a bold shoot for cities of the north and east. On their way out they stopped at one little town, gave a few lectures and organized a society, now flourishing, and at last accounts were harmoniously proceeding to build a spiritual temple—an index of what might have been accomplished in a dozen larger towns.

The question presents itself, how long must this population of more than one hundred and fifty thousand remain unorganized?

I am an old man, nearly 85 years of age, my poor old hands my only source of support. There are a few other Spiritualists in Dennison, but like myself they are poor. The masses are hungry. They ask for bread, and the fakes grant them a stone and take their dollar. So it must remain until the people are in a condition to utilize the truth. L. LEWIS.

Sophia Adelaide's Book.

As appropriate to the columns of a Spiritual paper I now transcribe a passage from Sophia-Adelaide's book, Chapter XXXV., headed "Despair." The second Count De Lundi, on his death-bed at Dayton, had been married to Sophia, deeming it advisable for her protection. A day or two later her faithful nurse and tutor, Anna Campbell, suddenly died.

"I was the last," says Sophia, "to leave Lady Anna's room. Yielding to the effects of the fatigue I had undergone and of the draught prescribed for me by the doctor, I fell into a feverish and uneasy sleep, full of agitating dreams. After dozing a while I went through a singular experience. I awoke with a start in the bed where I had lain down to spend the night; I heard myself distinctly called by name. I sat up and listened. The voices which sounded in my ears were those of the Count and Lady Anna. They seemed to rise from some mysterious depths, and uttered only my name, but in a tone of heartrending anguish. 'Sophia-Adelaide.' I longed to respond to this appeal, but how was I to find my way to the beloved ones whose voices were thus summoning me? I felt that I had to die in order to rejoin my friends—but how was I to die?

"On the console-table, near at hand, was a small bottle of laudanum, of which the doctor had made me take a few drops. I rose and seizing it, drained it all. Then I threw myself at full length on my bed, crying out in response to the spectral voices, 'I am coming.'

"My health has never fully recovered from the attempt to poison myself, nor from the effects of the violent emotion which endangered my very existence during that dreadful time. For days I remained delirious with fever."

Sophia was then not quite sixteen years of age. Not until thirty-two years later did her book appear, only to be suppressed by the royal family.

SAVE YOUR SOUL.

I am sick of the preacher's only strain,
Save your soul, save your soul, save your soul!
I am tired of hearing forever and aye
The same old song from the pulpit roll.

It seems to me like a selfish cry,
This telling a man that the only thing
Of any importance here below
Is saving himself from a future sting.

Far nobler, better, it seems to me,
To tell a man to save some other,
To send him up and down through the world
Seeking and saving his fallen brother.

To put him off from the beaten track,
Out into the hedges of sin and shame,
To teach and tell to the captives bound
The beauty and glory of virtue's name,

To rescue the starving from sin and death,
To rescue the sinning one from crime,
To preach the gospel of present helps
To the weary ones on the shores of time.

To seek out those whom the world forgets,
To plant a flower on a nameless grave,
To hide the erring one in the heart,
And strengthen it with a purpose brave.

If a man does this, I dare affirm
That he can afford to forego all care
About going to heaven, and give his time
To the work of getting his neighbor there.

LAKE BRADY, O.

Incidents of Last Sunday's Meeting.

That Sunday, August 24, and the last Sunday but one of the Lake Brady camp for 1902, was a success financially, spiritually and in the way of a large attendance there isn't the least doubt.

The weather was unusually pleasant, in fact, was all that could be expected or wished for, and from early morn till noon Lake Brady patrons came to the camp in goodly numbers over the electric and steam railways, and about 10 a. m. the Lake Brady special over the Cleveland and Pittsburg railroad, from Cleveland, with its coaches well filled with human freight steamed up to its station at Lake Brady and a few moments thereafter the friends from Cleveland were comfortably seated beneath a large tent and temporary auditorium provided by the association for this season's use, and in a short time thereafter the morning services began. With Mrs. Marian Carpenter, of Detroit, as speaker and message medium for the day, a spiritual feast was in store for and assured to Lake Brady patrons.

For one facing the large audience, and who as well has made a study of faces and knows something of human nature, it was plainly to be seen that it was composed of Spiritualists honest and true, and not curiosity seekers and fine clothes exhibitors, as is often the case at orthodox church gatherings. The male portion was not there for policy's sake or business reasons, nor did the fair sex turn out for the purpose of showing a new dress or a new hat. They were there assembled on quite a different mission. It was for the purpose of listening to soul-uplifting and inspiring thoughts as they eloquently flowed from the lips of an inspired speaker, and to hear, if possible, from their arisen loved ones.

That Mrs. Carpenter's lectures were highly appreciated, was evidenced by the strict attention paid. While the tests were being given and messages delivered, the interest manifested could not very well have been more intense. The tests were clean-cut and readily recognized while the messages from arisen loved ones were both consoling and grand, and in several instances were indeed affecting and brought tears to the eyes of the loved one addressed, also to many others of a sympathetic nature. Of the numerous consoling messages that were delivered there are two which I would like to mention. The first of these two spirits to come and manifest was a young man who at an unguarded moment committed suicide by deliberately shooting himself through the head with a revolver. To a relative he repeated, the second time, that through taking his own life he made the greatest mistake of his life, which he realized since leaving the earth body, and for which rash act he has had to suffer since entering the spirit world. (A timely warning to all would-be or contemplated suicides). Those are the regrets and usual expressions of all suicides who have had an opportunity to return and converse with loved ones of earth.

The second and most affecting manifestation of spirit the writer has ever witnessed, and he has witnessed hundreds, was that of a young lady who is now 24 years of age but who has been in the spirit world for a number of years. This angelic spirit, for she is nothing less, being accustomed to controlling a sensitive's brain and vocal organs, took control of the medium and walking over to within a few feet of her mother who sat near the rostrum she delivered to her the grandest message I have ever listened to from the lips of an instrument of the spirit world. This message was clothed in lovely language and filled throughout with angelic love and sympathetic thought for her entire family, and especially so for the one addressed, whose life while living with a former husband was a very unhappy one. After which she again took control of the medium's vocal organs and sang the most beautiful and affecting song the writer has ever listened to from either the mortal or spirit side of life; and before she finished her mother had broken entirely down and tears were visible in the eyes of many of the large audience. The writer of this article being well acquainted with this lady and her present husband, who, by the way, are excellent people, was also visibly affected and he does not believe there was one in the audience whose sympathetic nature was not more or less appealed to and the divine spark within strung up to an unusual tension. To conclude, may the master minds of the spirit side of life and the angel world through chosen instruments continue to push forward and daily spread these grand truths, glad tidings and good news of the proof of immortality to the world at large, and especially to those yet in darkness on this plane of life, is the heartfelt wish of the writer.

The Cause at San Diego, Cal.

Believing it may interest our friends eastward to hear from us, I am impelled to write of our work.

On account of their plan of building this year, the First Spiritualist Society decided it would not be best to close their meetings during the camp season and thus let the interest die. I am lecturing and giving messages for the society, and we are having good audiences and considerable interest is manifested. Mr. Chas. Buss, vice-president, is developing quite an ability for public speaking at the mediums' meeting.

M. D. Thiebaud is now conductor of the lyceum, which office Chas. Buss had filled for three years. Mr. Thiebaud is assisting me in preparing a series of lyceum lessons, which we hope to have ready for use of other lyceums by fall. I have been urged by my spirit guides to arrange these lessons, which I believe will prove satisfactory and an assistance to increase interest in that line of work. Lack of lessons makes it difficult to secure teachers. We hope to put them in each lyceum at very small cost.

The ladies of this society have organized an Aid under the name of Busy Bees. They selected me as president, and I am proud of the work they are doing. The object is to furnish the auditorium in the new Temple. They ase preparing to hold a fair in November and in the meantime giving two socials per month.

Will C. Hodge was so pleased with San Diego air last winter, that he decided he must have more and came back from Chicago as fast as the train would bring him. He is now speaking at the hall on National avenue, for the San Diego Society of Spiritualists.

I shall remain here for some time yet, doing all I can for the spread of truth, by lecturing and platform messages, and also in private readings.

"Why I Am a Vegetarian." By J. Howard Moore. An address before the Chicago Vegetarian Society. Price 25 cents.

HERE AND HEREAFTER.

Mrs. Piper's Mediumship, and T. J. Hudson's Theories Critically Considered.

I have read many of the articles regarding the mediumship of Mrs. Piper, whom the Record-Herald was pleased to announce as the greatest of mediums, and after a study of the manifestations, the various articles recited as taking place through her instrumentality, I think she is yet in the primary department so far as mediumship and spiritual knowledge is concerned.

If Mrs. Piper has allowed her organism to be used fourteen or fifteen years to the extent claimed, and knows no more of what it is than expressed in those articles, and the Psychical Research Society has received through her no greater or more convincing demonstrations than the ones cited, I am free to believe her a very poor and limited instrument indeed.

I have seen hundreds of various manifestations, at times, places and under conditions that could leave no doubt in the mind of any sane, honest and well-balanced human being that those we call dead, but more correctly speaking who have made their transition from the material body into the great limitless and endless eternity, can and do return and communicate.

If Mrs. Piper, Thomson J. Hudson or any other Theorist can produce any demonstrated proof that what not only myself but thousands of others have seen and heard, is only the action of what they are pleased to call the subjective mind, I would like to hear from them. I tip not my hat to any man's theory, I bow my head to any one's proof.

I will mention a few of the demonstrations I have seen and heard in the presence of sensitives, or those more commonly known as mediums, who are so constituted chemically that they serve as instruments in the hands of those who have passed into the condition after transition or death, and the various forms of manifestation are about as limitless as the methods of communication on this planet.

Some of the methods are, using the organism of the sensitive and speaking through the lips the same as the spirit did when occupying its own body, difference in method, tone, pronunciation, etc., being accounted for the same as different musical instruments although used by the same performer. Some can make one instrument imitate another fairly well, while others could not turn the handle of a hand organ correctly.

Clairvoyance or spiritual sight, clairaudience or spiritual hearing, speaking with independent voices, independent writing, automatic writing, speaking through trumpets, materialization, etherealization, transfiguration, etc., of which I consider that materialization is the highest form of manifestation, because it shows the most and greatest evidence of continuity of life. "Seeing is believing."

In the presence of a lady sensitive five feet in height, who possesses the phases of instrumentality known as materialization, clairvoyance, clairaudience, trumpet, independent voices, automatic writing, independent writing, conscious and unconscious control, and under the strictest of test conditions, I have seen two male forms side by side, each over six feet in height, dressed in proper attire, both placing their hands upon my shoulders, and talking in perfectly distinct voices, both passing away as a bubble. How does subjective mind produce these?

I have seen the sensitive supported on either side by forms of different size who could not possibly have gained admission to the room in any other than spiritual method, and both just as material to the touch for the time being as the sensitive herself, and all three in plain sight. How does subjective mind produce this?

I have seen a form fully a head taller than the sensitive, bring forth apparently from space directly in front of my eyes, a babe, and place it in my arms. I saw its face and heard its cry; it was perfectly natural in every way. How is this connected with subjective mind?

I have seen a lady more than a head taller than the sensitive, take a large bouquet of flowers, disappear as if passing slowly through the floor, taking the flowers with her. This in a residence not occupied by the sensitive, in the presence of nine witnesses, in a light so bright that no movement could escape any half open eye. Is that subjective mind?

I have seen hundreds of people meet their relatives and friends who have laid aside the body by the process known as death, and who through the instrumentality of the sensitive had taken on for the time being a body as near the counterpart of the one in which they were known on earth as possible, some as infants, some who were near seven feet in height, weighing near three hundred pounds, showing characteristics peculiar to themselves when here, and many times telling the manner in which death came to them, as a means of identification, placing their arms about the necks of those to whom they came, bestowing kisses upon them as naturally as before their death, not one alone but two at one time, of different sizes, neither being the size of the sensitive, dressed in beautiful robes, under conditions which the sensitive could not possibly do by the aid of material paraphernalia and mortal assistance without immediate detection. How does subjective mind do it?

In the presence of the sensitive, with no other mortal in the house, all doors and windows closed and locked, a light bright enough to perfectly distinguish individuals, I have seen a lady a head taller than the sensitive, dressed in the most beautiful white robes, come apparently from space in the middle of the room, ten feet from where the sensitive was sitting, and talk to me in full voice of the most beautiful tone, for fifteen minutes, take my arm, walk about the room, then disappear as a bubble would if brought in quick contact with a pin point.

Is that my subjective mind, Mr. Hudson?

Not long ago during a meeting in which materialization was being witnessed by sixteen people, seventy-six full forms of various sizes appeared and were recognized. One walked across the room to the gentleman to whom she came, and who recognized her as a friend who had passed into the beyond. She took him by the arm and escorting him to a side window, which was closed and locked as well as being held fast by paint, raised the curtain and vanished through the window. In a short time she returned through the same window, ran across the room and gave the gentleman some flowers and fern leaves, real, natural and freshly picked. There was nothing of the kind in or about the house previous to that moment. Whose subjective mind did they come from, Mr. Hudson?

These are only a few of the thousands of demonstrations I have seen under conditions where there could be no incentive other than to show me truth, and where paraphernalia and mortal assistance was impossible without detection, and I defy any human being on the face of the earth to produce the same results under the same conditions without being a medium aided by spirit forces.

I have seen hundreds of demonstrations of spirit power under the strictest test conditions, compared with which those above recited dwindle into comparative insignificance, and would astound ninety per cent of the old line Spiritualists, who have been looking for tests in every meeting they have attended for forty years, and are not yet satisfied.

I am not affiliated with any church or ism. I recognize there is truth as well as error in all religious organizations, and I accept truth wherever and whenever I find it, and regret error wherever it exists. It seems to me, however, that the foundation upon which Spiritualism is built, is more true and can be demonstrated by more actual proof of that for which every creed came into existence, than all other isms put together, for so far as I have been able to observe, it is the only ism, creed or belief, that goes beyond theory and actually shows that for which all others are kneeling by the roadside praying and hoping for, with their eyes and ears closed against the very answer they demand regarding the hereafter, where, what and how it is.

There are many Spiritualists who make false claims for money. There are many orthodox ministers who preach simply for money. There are many merchants who make false claims as to the merits of their wares for money. In fact there is no sect, denomination or business into which error intentional or otherwise does not find its way, but absolute truth cannot be disproved, and when my mother, whose body I saw lowered into the cold grave, comes back to me as she has through the instrumentality of a sensitive whose life and character bears not a stain, and places her arm about my neck, her lips against my own, and I see, hear and recognize her, there is no scientist, preacher, doctor, lawyer or other human being in mortal form who can prove by any line of argument that it is not my mother from the world beyond, come to cheer, encourage and enlighten me, and prove by the highest of nature's methods that "there is no death;" and I do not believe there is a sane, honest and intelligent man or woman in the world who could witness the thousands of various manifestations that I have during the past few years, without knowing positively as I do, that death is simply transition to the next condition of life; that as life ends here, so it begins there; that those called dead can and do return and communicate, they retain their individuality and memory; that the so-called subjective mind is only a theory not indorsed by the higher authority of the world beyond; that man needs and has but one mind, and that one contains the power for unfoldment and development to take in or cover all for which the Theorist provides so many separate minds with different capacities. One mind with all capacity is enough for me, the one mind that is master of its multiplicity of expressions, whether subjective, objective or projective.

Under proper conditions there is apparently nothing beyond the grasp of the mind, which the ever supreme ruling force is causing man to discover as fast as man needs and is progressed enough to comprehend, such as telegraphy, telephone, steam and wireless telegraphy.

The communicating connection between this and the spirit world is through the instrumentality of sensitives or mediums. The spirit world contains all classes as does this world. This world contains mediums adapted by daily life, surroundings and practices, to the uses and abuses of the good, bad or indifferent of the spirit world.

Like attracts like. Some of the oldest Spiritualists will grasp as truth anything from the spirit world, without regard to how it comes, will accept as pure manifestations, stuff coming through a drunken, smoking, lying, swearing, scheming medium who tries to rob them of their dollars and their individuality with the assistance of spirits of like character. If you want a drink of pure, clear and healthy water, you will not dip it from a sewer with a dirty cup. If you want to meet your dear ones from the higher spheres of the world beyond, demand instruments for them to express through who are pure, honest, unselfish, and above reproach in every way; be honest yourselves, maintain dignified and pure individuality and results will be the same.

The greatest problem for man to grapple with, is self, and if preachers and professors would devote half as much time and study to spiritual manifestations as they have to saturating themselves with blind ideas and theories of other men with no greater capacity than themselves, in order that they may prefix the title of Reverend or Professor and draw salary, they would know the truth and be rightly educated to preach and teach without the need of hollow title for their followers to bow to.

If you would be students of truth, lay aside the idea that you must kneel beneath a steeple and chime of bells and pray to your imaginary God to lead you aright in the straight and narrow path that leads to heaven. Rather stand before your mirror and pray that the man you there behold will aid and save you, for he is the one who must be your savior, who must act to obtain that salvation you crave, who is limitless in power to know, the one whom to know fully, is to know all.

If you are guilty of wrong doing, do not accuse all others of being the same, do not say any one else is wrong until you can prove yourself right by practical demonstration.

If what I have said is not true as I have stated it, and Prof. Hudson or any one else can prove by actual demonstration and not theory that it is the action of the subjective, objective, or projective faculty of the mind of either the sensitive or myself, then I might be induced to believe that Chicago is New York, or that an automobile is a horse.

The great trouble with college trained public men is, they spend too much time in their studies among their books, trying to solve the greatest of all problems by reading what others like themselves have guessed at, and sold their guesses to the people in bound volumes, instead of opening their eyes and ears and going about seeing and hearing what is going on in the world outside of what the material eye beholds.

If all ministers would devote as much time to the study of spirit return as they do to preparation for the ministry, they would all preach the shine-ism, be more contented, all their churches to overflowing, and their physical necessities would not go uncared for.

SPEAK FOR JUSTICE.

Let the Consequences Be What They May.

It is heartfinding to think of the thousands of human beings who are living on this beautiful earth to-day in a state of bodily uncleanliness worse than the beasts of the field. Whose mental life is overgrown with noxious weeds. Who are ignorant, vicious and intemperate. Who know not the meaning of purity in life. Who live in squalor, misery and despair. Who procure money by all sorts of evil proceedings, and then expend it in vices of the most degraded kind. And, still worse, they propagate children who live and grow up, only to repeat in all its revolting aspects, the life of their progenitors. It is not to far-away China or Africa that the missionaries should be sent, but to our own home cities, large and small.

This work is one which requires noble sacrifices and infinite patience. There are many people who live in ignorance and sin; who could be restored to a proper way of living, and who would, perhaps, become a shining light in their community.

No one knows how many men there are, who, if their minds were free from intoxicants, would prove geniuses, and give to the world many valuable contributors to the arts and sciences.

Too much cannot be said against the evils of intemperance. It is by repetition and reiteration, that the mind is made to accept things which it would not receive at the first presentation. It is working on this principle, by constantly appealing to all to help in the work of combatting sin; that we are finally able to create a satisfactory effect.

Let everyone put in a word whenever and wherever possible for the temperance cause, and for creating better prenatal conditions and purer environments for the little children.

What a shame to see little children brought up and taught the ways of sin before they are old enough to discriminate between right and wrong. In after life these children become a curse to themselves and others.

The child's mind is like a sponge. It absorbs and takes up good and bad, alike. And if taught bad things in early life, it is thus molded into an evil creature, and never having known the difference between goodness and badness, it is, to my way of thinking, not accountable for its actions.

This subject, the temperance cause and the promotion of better conditions for the born and unborn child, should receive the earnest consideration of all lovers of truth and justice.

A child is as a flowering vine. If trained in ways of purity it will grow and spread in beauty and health. But if brought up in evil paths, it is stunted and sickly.

Reincarnation.

"Let darkness go; the will-o'-the wisp that blends to
With blinking light to pile more gloom on gloom,
This thirst for life, forever quench; it drags
From birth to death and death to birth, the soul.
He conquers all who conquers himself.
Know this
And never yield."

—Swami Vivekananda.

A great number of earnest and thinking Spiritualists are bothering themselves over the intricate problem of reincarnation, and as it seems to me our friends are making this question more difficult and complicated than it really is. A writer in a recent issue of The Progressive Thinker seems to be vacillating between doubt and belief in this form of existence, and judging from the trend of thought in his article he seems to think it "a waste of thought to contemplate it." And no wonder, for all the reasons he adduces in favor of it, are too weak to prove anything. But he has forgotten to avail himself of the strongest and most convincing evidence in favor of rebirths; the testimony of the disembodied spirits themselves corroborated by reason and philosophy, as also the verdict of those incarnate spirits who even in this form of existence are able to remember previous lives. What do they say on the matter? Well, a great number of those from the other shore, whose opinion has been asked, have answered in the negative, while just as many have given an affirmative reply. But we must remember that spirits are not infallible. Some of them know more than we, some less, some are deceitful and even willfully misguiding, and we therefore must test their statements by the standard of reason and science. And further, does not spiritual philosophy teach us not to overlook the important fact that the entire world of spirits is a systematic realm of spheres or circles, and that our own mundane plane is one of those spheres? We are spirits clothed in a gross material form. The spheres above us are inhabited by spirits in a more refined material form, while those below us are still more material than we are. By a slow and gradual evolution our spirits work themselves up or rather grow up from a lower and more material sphere to a higher and more spiritual one. No spirit can enter a higher sphere until he is ripe for it, as he certainly will drift to where his moral and intellectual center of gravity is located. If at the time of his death this center is to be found in a higher sphere he will ascend thither, but if it is in a lower one he will sink down thither. If it is still on this earthly plane he will be borne here again, as no outside power can move him away from the environment to which his ruling love attracts him. This fact, which by the way has been pointed out to me by a highly intellectual denizen of a higher sphere, seems to me to be a conclusive evidence of reincarnation, supported as it is both by spirit testimony and by natural and spiritual law. But reincarnation is not arbitrarily imposed or forced upon anyone. If it occurs in an individual case, it does so simply in accordance with an immutable law, and it is in our own power to prevent it by leading a pure and spiritual life. Viewed from the above standpoint, this problem is a very simple one and dissolves itself into a natural and law-bound evolution from lower forms of existence into higher ones, with the usual relapses and phases of healthy growth or degeneration.

Genius, a Condition of Sensitiveness.

The unconscious sensitiveness of great authors, and their susceptibility to spiritual influence, is a fact. It is notable that many of the best works of an author's life, were written under great financial difficulties; and when the writer was living "from hand to mouth." And some of them, in after years, when living in fame and success, are never able to reach such a high degree of inspiration, as when they were living "under rations."

I do not think that it is as easy for a person who is living in luxury, surrounded by everything that heart can wish, to compose a work that will find favor with the masses; as it is for a frugal-living author, whose faculties are fully awake, whose brain and bodily powers are not devoted to the digesting of table viands, and whose mind is vibrating with the minds of the struggling masses, the common people.

The struggling author, concentrating in some lonely room, laboring with all the pent-up earnestness of body and soul; consciously or unconsciously develops a sensitiveness to the vibrations of the spiritual beings who are ever ready to impress some mind with a truth which will lead to the betterment of the human race.

The struggling author also comes en rapport with the inner chambers of his being. His subconscious mind, the treasure-house of memory; owing to his deep state of concentration, and his burning wish to "do something," becomes accessible. He formulates an original thought, and then glancing over the garnered gems of lore, reposing in the subjective mind, he selects his expressions and clothes his fancies in words profound.

I believe that some authors are in a state of auto-hypnotism while writing their best productions. And I also think that many books are inspired by spiritual beings.

Critical Thoughts—Inconsistency.

If, as the church teaches, man lives on beyond the grave and will sooner or later reach a heaven of perpetual enjoyment, or a hell of never-ending torment, it becomes a matter of the greatest importance to every human being. If our final destiny is either heaven or hell, and if that destiny depends on anything we can do during our short stay here, it behooves us, as sensible men and women, to "work while it is called to-day;" surely we should "seek first the kingdom of heaven," not only for ourselves but for everybody. Anything short of this would indicate inexcusable folly.

We hesitate not to go at midnight, if need be, to notify a neighbor or even a stranger of any bodily or financial harm of which he might be in danger, if we should know it of. We work and strive to "lay up treasures upon the earth," to educate ourselves and our children, that we may be prepared to meet and successfully fight the battles of this present life. We rise up early and work late; we leave no stone unturned in order that we may meet the demands of the "natural man."

If anyone should exercise the same interest and industry regarding spiritual things, he would be counted a fanatic or a crank, and treated with a measure of contempt. Nearly all church people of the present time show so little enthusiasm for their religion that we are ready to believe they are "neither cold nor hot." If they really believe, as they profess to believe, that many of their own children, their neighbors and their children, and so many others are in gseat danger of such a terrible fate, their indifference is simply wonderful; beyond comprehension. They could neither sleep nor rest, and would refuse to be comforted if they knew some dear friend or relative were in much danger of some bodily harm; and yet such danger would be as nothing compared to the loss of a soul in an endless hell.

The churchman may be very pious, but it can hardly be said that he is very consistent. J. W. NATIONS.

CONNECTED WORLDS.

A Lady's Interesting and Instructive Experience with the "Psyche" Board.

As for Jeanette's doubting attitude towards Walter, he did not permit it to last long, but did his best to establish his identity by causing other communicators to refer to him and his character. Of course, his own relatives in spirit life, together with hers, had to be the principal witnesses. Jeanette was intensely pleased when she could converse once more with Walter's father, Professor B., her former teacher in French, for whom she had always felt a deep veneration. He, as well as other members of his family that had crossed the boundaries of earth, gave her messages which she gladly delivered by mail. But when she again asked for a friendly chat in French with her former friend and teacher, the correspondent calling himself Professor B., begged leave to use the German language, which, he asserted, had become so dear to him that the fluency of his native tongue had been impaired by lack of exercise.

This seemed rather strange to Jeanette. She never knew a Frenchman who did not prefer his own tongue to any other. Strange it seemed also that Walter now and then dropped an English sentence, while Jeanette was sure that he had never studied English while she knew him on earth. When she expressed her surprise, he claimed to have made many friends among English spirits and was making good use of his opportunities to learn their language; that he was studying it diligently and would also be glad to profit by her superior grammatical knowledge. So Jeanette endeavored to teach him while conversing, but found him a curious specimen of a pupil, at one time professing ignorance of primary subjects, and another time surprising her by expressions only used by people who had spoken the language for years.

She soon felt that he was not an earnest student, in spite of his professions to the contrary. He pretended to take lessons of his father, and especially of her son Fred, whose merits he kept on extolling and whose friendship and spiritual leadership he professed to hold of inestimable value to him.

By and by their correspondence, first begun in German, was intermingled with fluent English, such as nobody can acquire on earth by a few years of study. But who can judge about the possibilities in higher worlds?

Another curious thing seemed Walter's frequent statement that he was roaming the woods that were intrusted to his care, guarding the animals and shooting them when too wild or too greedy, and throwing their bodies back upon earth. Perceiving that Jeanette was shocked at such a thing being possible in a spiritual world, he seemed offended by her skepticism. He also claimed to be more merciful towards those animals, in proportion as Jeanette was amiable and trusting toward him.

One day he reported that Fred had killed a deer forty feet long, adding that those creatures never stopped growing. Jeanette naturally treated the story as a joke, besides deprecating the idea that her gentle son might have developed in spirit life the savage passion of hunting, while on earth he never evinced the slightest tendency in that direction.

The next day he tried to make her believe that his head had been injured when fighting a vicious big animal, and Jeanette's laughter irritated him so much that he used insulting language, causing Jeanette to stop conversation at once by putting the board aside. When she took it up again after some time, there was a message purporting to come from Fred, confirming Walter's assertion and pleading for him. Then Walter spoke for himself and begged forgiveness, though reproaching Jeanette with lack of sympathy for a man whose brain was suffering so much that he could not control his temper. This story of his head being injured by an animal was afterward often referred to by Walter; in fact so often that it suggested to Jeanette a kind of monomania.

Rousing her sympathy always meant forgiveness. He perceived this quickly and made the most of it; he also commented upon and seemed to appreciate her readiness to forgive so much the more, as he needed it constantly, his temper growing worse every day. Whenever one spasm was over, he tried to make it forgotten by the most touching amiability. He showed tender care in advising Jeanette in every-day problems of life; encouraging, warning, suggesting ways and means, and showing much good will and sagacity, though making frequent mistakes. He also claimed to often "run a race with her" when she briskly walked along the streets, to look out for danger and be her guardian from morn to night.

This kind of intercourse was rather filling a gap in Jeanette's life, for though Randolph was a kind man originally, and much attached to her in his own peculiar way, he was usually so deeply engrossed by his own plans and interests that he never stopped to think of his wife needing anything beyond food and clothing. Neither was there with him a chance of any cheerful, or at least quiet, exchange of thought; his impatience and irritability, coupled with his own preconceived ideas, making such a thing impossible. Thus, lonely Jeanette felt grateful for the seemingly harmless intercourse with a sympathetic old friend, and forgave his eccentricities so much the more readily, as she had been used to Randolph's erratic ways and had gone through a thorough school of patience and forbearance.

She finally became so well accustomed to Walter's spiritual companionship, that it seemed a necessity that she consulted him about everything, however trifling, and this was evidently what he desired her to do. He responded any moment when she took up the board, and she could not help wondering what had become of the rest of her correspondents. When longing for her son and calling Fred, he apparently answered; at least the correspondent claimed to be her son, and she had to believe, not being able to see him, though the messages often bore characteristics that were not Fred's. Was he changing? How could she know? All she was assured of was the fact that the communications came from across the border, and that they principally aimed at removing all doubt about Walter's identity.

Now and then some friend or relative was graciously introduced by Walter, who jealously seemed to guard the avenue and even watch with suspicion for every affectionate expression contained in the messages. Jealousy was indeed the newest phase of the situation. Walter insisted more and more on his right of exclusive possession of Jeanette's love; he declared that his own had grown stronger and stronger for having been kept in check so many years. He frankly acknowledged having lost Jeanette formerly by his own fault, but now since he had found her again, he boldly asserted his first and superior right to her against Randolph's, who, he maintained, was doomed to relinquish her anyhow ere long.

Jeanette could not well contradict him. She knew she would have been his wife had he asked her in due time. Now she was Randolph's, and meant to be true to him until death, faithful to her promise near the altar, yet, so she argued, she had wronged Walter by distrust and by hurriedly pledging her faith to another, and now he had a sacred right to claim her in the next world. Could she refuse to give her promise? It was spiritual courtship and no infringement on the rights of Randolph; neither was there any terrestrial laws against loving a denizen of another world. So her feelings responded to Walter's without reserve, though she could not comprehend how jealousy came to enter into their spiritual relations.

Walter made the most of opportunities and took more and more possession of Jeanette's mind. Though she gave the most scrupulous care to her husband who had been ailing for years, and tried to be as affectionate as ever, some chill was creeping into her feelings towards him, and Walter helped in that direction the best he could, by remarks calculated to exaggerate Randolph's faults in the eyes of Jeanette.

This would have seemed more natural to her, had Walter been on earth, but she was too much under his influence to ponder about that and so he steadily gained over her, lulling to sleep any suspicion that might have lingered in her mind.

One night after retiring, she gave an affectionate thought to the memory of her son, as she was in the habit of doing, and then she said mentally: "Good night, Walter." At this, she was startled by something that felt like a slight electric shock, traveling all along her body. What was it? What caused the strange, almost frightening sensation? She could not account for it till next day, when Walter said through the board: "You gave me great pleasure by calling me yesterday night." "Calling him? She never called him unless desirous of communication through the board. For what else should she call him? Was he not out of the body? Soul-communion could only be kept up by mutual soul-expression, which is spiritual contact. Or was there any possibility of physical contact? Her experience pointed in that direction. Is it more than imagination, that a real body, though invisible to our mortal eyes, encompasses the soul and can, under given conditions, approach our very senses?

The idea made Jeanette stagger. Yet, however true it might prove, something was wrong in the way of demonstration. She had been taken by surprise, and that was unworthy of Walter. Or did he really believe she called him and was aware of his power to approach her thus? Ah! love is blind and forgiving. Walter had an easy time to overcome her doubts. "Of course he was mistaken," he admitted it freely, "but what of it? Did she mean to repulse him? Was he not entitled to approach her as nearly as the laws of his new condition would allow? Moreover, the social views in higher spheres are different from those of this planet, where limits, drawn by necessity, are met in every direction; where individual selfishness dictates narrow principles and chains the wings of love."

Sophistries like these, accompanied by Walter's repeated professions of irresistible attraction toward her, did not entirely satisfy Janette's scrupulous nature, but then, she was human and he spoke from a higher plane; this, it seemed to her, was an argument not to be withstood, and in consequence, she meekly submitted when his visits were repeated without pretense of having been called.

The mists of the situation grew denser one day when Walter demanded a kiss. "A kiss!" she ejaculated. "Can I kiss a spirit?" "Never mind spirits," came the answer, "simply kiss." Wondering and laughing at the same time, she tried to mimic the desired act towards what seemed to her empty air, and lo! there it was again, that same feeling of a slight shock throughout the body. The demand was often repeated and always followed by the same phenomenon, and Walter soon grew so eager that Jeanette began to feel frightened at his impetuosity.

Along with that eagerness came an increasing tendency to jealousy. One by one, Walter introduced, or pretended to introduce, almost every man with whom Jeanette had been on the slightest friendly footing during her girlhood, and whose impressions had of course, almost been effaced from her mind. Only one of them, as far as she knew, had gone to spirit land; but here they turned up, one after another, claiming to come from another world, and desirous of shaking hands with her across the border. Walter seemed to stand by, listening and watching for any sympathetic word that might escape Jeanette, and then upbraiding and tormenting her with jealous remarks until she lost patience.

Then he invariably begged forgiveness and tried to explain his behavior by renewed protestations of uncontrollable love. So willing she always was to forgive, that Walter himself commented upon making it too easy for him to fall back into his fits of jealousy. These fits grew more alarming when they were turned against her husband. None of Randolph's weaknesses seemed to escape his notice, and he profited by every given opportunity to put them in the worst light. He even invented faults and evidently tried his best to chase Randolph entirely out of Jeanette's heart.

Meanwhile, that object of jealousy was in a condition of health that claimed more and more the care and solicitude of his wife, and her faithfulness to duty added new fuel to Walter's unreasonable jealousy. She could not make him comprehend that plain duty is the first law in our conduct of life, and that moreover, any sufferer has claims on our help and sympathy, even outside of the bonds of matrimony. He, on the other hand, tried to make her understand that he was a sufferer also, and had the first claim on her sympathies, but he only succeeded in perplexing without convincing her.

Sometimes she was frightened by a message, purporting to come from her son, announcing his father's sudden death during the night. Of course such a message put her into a state of worry and painful expectation, depriving her of sleep and weakening her system. When daylight appeared and the danger seemed passed, then came a message of explanation, stating that the tenacity of Randolph's life-power was defying all calculation. This came from Walter, while Fred claimed to have sustained his father's vitality and helped him over the crisis.

Naturally, Jeanette's concern about the life and health of her husband, tended only to increase Walter's jealousy. "You love him after all!" he once exclaimed in a fierce passion.

It must be understood that, though no actual voice was heard while the spelling through the board went on, there were the most vivid impressions going along with the spelling, and inner voices were perceived with so much distinctness that the speaker seemed to stand close by the board. And indeed, when Jeanette one day asked of Walter how near he was when communicating, he answered, "just a few feet from you." He also proved by frequent remarks, that he saw and heard everything that was going on in the house.

What a pity for Jeanette, that she could not see him! Then all her doubts might have been dispelled at once; but as it was they kept increasing and came to a climax.

One evening, Randolph's passing away the coming night was again announced with solemn protestations that this time it would prove true; but happily it proved false once more, though Randolph passed a restless night, and Jeanette a sleepless one, of course.

When communicating in the morning, Walter became more and more excited while speaking of Randolph's condition, and in a fit of rage, wound up by exclaiming: "I must kill him! He is in my way!"

Jeanette, though not believing in a spirit's power to kill a man, felt thoroughly shocked and frightened at such a burst of passion. She declared that these could not be words of Walter's; he never could have degenerated into such a wretch, and without awaiting an answer, she cast the board aside and did not take it up again for a long time. However, she felt one day so strongly drawn towards it, that she could not resist, and soon was listening again, almost against her will.

Walter knew so well how to engage her attention, how to rouse her sympathies and lull to sleep her suspicions. There was that tussle with an infuriated animal, mentioned formerly, which had injured his head, and was at the bottom of all his strange behavior. "He could not be himself under such conditions; evidently not, he was irresponsible and to be pitied rather than blamed."

To allay her suspicions, lingering in spite of all he could say, Fred and other trustworthy friends and relatives corroborated Walter's statements as they did before, and she did not question their identity, though she could not see them.

It felt so pleasant to have her suspicions explained away, and it is but human to believe what suits us, so the former relations were soon established once more, kisses and all, and the occasional fits of jealousy were judged more leniently, though they began to extend even to her own dear son.

Spirit Communication from Washington Irving.

I will give you a few extracts from a journal I have kept; I think you will find something in it to interest you:

When on leaving the earth plane I found myself surrounded by loving friends gladly welcoming me to my new abode, with what wonder and admiration I gazed on all around me—my kindred, my friends, even my little playfellow, whom I had lost years and years ago; but how changed they all were. Those who had died in decrepit old age were youthful again; those that had died in childhood had grown to maturity, yet strange to say I recognized each at a glance. It is by their personality, and not by their features, that we recognize our friends. How sad the parting, but how joyful the reunion; no pen can describe it, no tongue can tell it, as we gaze with rapture into the eyes of those we loved on earth, to find them more beautiful than when on earth, and radiant with health and happiness. Then it is we realize our fondest hopes and cherished dreams have all come to pass.

All the years of grief and separation have been obliterated by this one glad, joyful and triumphant victory over death and the grave.

Now the parting seems but yesterday; the sorrows are but wayside messengers helping us on our way. Then it is we see on looking back how little we know of this vast plan of God, how puny were our efforts, how dwarfed our own personality in comparison to God's will and ways.

If we in our blindness had been left to go our own way, without those spirit friends to guide us, without their watchful care over us, where, indeed, would we land; certainly not in this haven of rest.

Here it is we can see the workings of the spheres, the wonderful mechanism of the universe—one vast storehouse of learning; but one does not need to grovel in the dust, as it were, to be enlightened, but just to desire knowledge and it is revealed to you.

Here it is that knowledge is power. With all the fabled richness of Golconda; with all the magic of the Egyptians, one cannot work his way into this blissful abode; but by right doing and loving your neighbor as yourself, you will find the pearly gates flung wide open to receive you.

That is the passport to the high spheres; not those who in the pride of their hearts gave alms to be known of men, not caring for God or his children, but hoping for an earthly reward, are highest in this world of righteousness, but those who emulated their Savior's example, with meek and lowly mien doing their allotted task, not seeking for earthly advancement, but knowing their labors were not in vain they are the ones that hear that welcome plaudit, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into thy rest."

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

A PROMINENT ROMAN CATHOLIC ON SPIRITUALISM.

A well known, and, indeed, eminent man of letters, contributes to the March number of The Nineteenth Century an article which he entitles "Concerning Ghost Stories," in which he quotes, by way of text as it were, the following passage from Cardinal Newman's sermon on the "Invisible World:" "The dead, when they depart hence, do not cease to exist, but they retire from this visible scene of things, or, in other words, they cease to act towards us and before us through our senses. * * * They remain; but without the usual means of approach towards us and correspondence with us. * * *. We are in a world of spirits as well as in a world of sense." Thus the late Cardinal, in the current phrase of the day, "gives himself away" on the question of spirit return; and to him—as an orthodox Roman Catholic, like Mr. Lilly, assures us—"the phenomenal universe was but a veil, hiding from us spiritual realities;" and thereupon he proceeds to inquire, "Can any communication reach us from beyond that veil?" This, as he observes, is a question of fact, and he unhesitatingly declares that "the evidence for an affirmative answer to it seems to him overwhelming." And, he adds, "I do not hesitate to say that the testimony upon which many histories of apparitions rest is so clear, so concrete and so cogent, as to leave no room for doubt in a candid mind—a mind, as the phrase is, open to conviction." The same degree of certainty which justified, in the opinion of Chief Baron Pollock, the conviction of the Mannings of the crime of murder, attaches itself, in Mr. Lilly's opinion, to the evidence in support of many well known apparitions; and this evidence, he further asserts, is such as "to leave no room for incredulity, except in a mind dominated by a first principle which blocks belief." But this incredulity, resulting from a variety of causes, such as ignorance, prejudice, perversity, stupidity and conceit, is so deplorably prevalent as to prevent people from investigating psychic phenomena, or from examining the facts attested by those who have. Such stolid persons meet every statement and every argument by peremptorily exclaiming, "I do not believe in spirit return and therefore it is not and cannot be true;" quite unregardful that our benighted forefathers, a few centuries ago, used to cry out, "We do not believe that the earth is round and that it revolves around the sun; therefore both of these things are impossibilities." It is no use arguing with such people; for we are reminded by a venerable Book that "as a dog returneth to his vomit, so a fool returneth to his folly;" and that as to those so-called scientists who are "so wise in their own conceit," there is "more hope of a fool than of them." Mr. Lilly clearly perceives the rank impolicy—so often pointed out in the Harbinger—of his own church discrediting the phenomena of Spiritualism, because, as he remarks, "it must be perfectly clear to any student of the Sacred Books that if communications from the unseen world such as those which we are considering, are impossible, and do not take place, these venerable documents lose all claim to credibility, so closely are stories of visions and revelations interwoven with their very texture. We must say the same of the 'Lives of the Saints.'"

These are, obviously, admissions of the highest importance, and tokens of the gradual penetration of the Roman Catholic mind by the light which is daily shining more brightly upon humanity. We may be perfectly certain that it will spread and grow; until, in the near future perhaps, the oldest of the churches may make the discovery that the scribes and prophets of the Old Testament were mediums, and that the greatest medium who has yet appeared upon the earth was the much reviled carpenter of Nazareth.

But, recurring to what Mr. Lilly says about the well authenticated psychic phenomena which are recorded in connection with the "Saints," it may be confidently asserted that these include every "manifestation" with which Spiritualism has rendered us so thoroughly familiar in recent years. Thus, thought-reading and clairvoyance were almost continual with Catherine of Siena, and were very frequent with Vincent Ferrier; while Theresa had only to pass near one of the nuns in her convent in order to divine her desires and temptations. On the 20th of July, 1560, while engaged in prayer, "She was transported," writes M. Joly, in his "Psychologie des Saintes," "to the high seas, where she was present in spirit at the death of forty priests and novices of the Society of Jesus, who were massacred by corsairs on the ship which was taking them to Brazil. She heard the voices of the victims, and amongst them she recognized that of her kinsman, Francis Godoi. When the vision disappeared, she told Father Balthazar Alvarez what she had seen. A month later, when the news of the martyrdom became officially known in Spain, Father Alvarez recognized the accuracy down to the smallest details, of the account given him at the time by Theresa." Another nun repeatedly witnessed and described events which were taking place at a distance, and, among others, she saw Francis the First of France taken prisoner at Pavia, and Rome sacked by the Imperialists. She often went into ecstacies and was lifted two or three feet from the ground. Raymond of Capua was chairaudient, and while in Genoa distinctly heard the words which Catherine of Siena sent him from her death bed in that city, upward of 120 miles distant as the crow flies. Those who were present on the occasion, afterwards repeated her words to him and he recognized them as the very same that had "reached his soul," to use his own expression. And similar instances might be quoted ad infinitum. Such phenomena are accepted as genuine by all devout Catholics. It is only when they occur in the experience of heretical Spiritualists that they are discredited!

THE ARMOR OF LOVE.

True religion is always loving and joyous. The spirit within finds expression in the thoughts we think, the motives we experience, the sentiments we cherish, and the attitude we assume towards ourselves and others. Spirituality is the "hall-mark" which distinguishes the genuine believer from the mere professor; for he who truly believes in himself, and has confidence in the supremacy of good, will necessarily be serene and self-possessed. He will maintain the attitude of trust in truth and goodness, and manifest that spirit in his disposition towards others. Being full to overflowing with generous loving kindness he will be proof against thoughts of ill from others, for they will fall harmless and he will be unconscious of their existence. Ella Wheeler Wilcox says:

"In olden times curses were supposed to blight the lives of those they fell upon; but in the light of modern Truth, we find they 'fly home to roost,' and eventually wither the lips which utter them.

"I would have no least fear of being cursed; but I would walk under a shadow of terror if in a moment of blind anger I allowed myself to wish evil to befall my worst foe, or refuse to lend him a helping hand if he asked for it and I knew I could aid him wisely.

"That does not mean that I would seek a close association or comradeship with some one who had wronged me, or that I would continue to confer favors upon the ungrateful or dishonest. There are people who can only be really helped by letting them alone. People who, so long as you show them the least consideration, will make a cat's-paw of you for their own selfish and unworthy aims, and eventually drag you with them into trouble and notoriety; just as there are people to whom a loan is a positive unkindness because it encourages their propensity to lean on others and delays the development of their own mental and moral powers. You may prove such a man's best friend by refusing to lend him money, and if in your heart you know your motive was a good one, it will not matter what he thinks of you or how bitterly he reproaches you or how he curses you.

"But if you allow your heart to frame a wish that poverty and misfortune befall any man—beware! That is a thing to fear. You may feel that his wealth is ill-gotten and that he is cruel and unsympathetic and that he needs penury and sorrow to chasten him, but leave that with God. Go your way, making your own life a rebuke to his—that is better employment than framing curses."

In the court of your own consciousness do not admit the thought that you are at enmity with any other individual. Even if you have been wronged or slighted, never allow yourself to acknowledge the fact by any feeling of resentment or retaliation. The sentiment of hatred will embitter your life and take the sweetness and joy out of your spirit. Let wise old Marcus Aurelius teach you how to rise above pain. He said: "Do not suppose you are hurt and your complaint ceases; cease your complaint and you are not hurt." Some one has said, "Vanquish your hatreds." That is good as far as it goes but surely it is better not to feel hatred; not to acknowledge even to yourself that you have fallen so low as to permit yourself to tolerate such unhappy sentiments. Envy, hatred, malice, uncharitableness, or even what is sometimes called "righteous resentment," are emotions which hurt those who are swayed by them, and, boomerang fashion, do them more hurt, reactively, than they can possibly do those against whom they are directed. Therefore, should you realize that such feelings have entered your heart and are inspiring your thoughts, strive earnestly to carry out the advice which Ella Wheeler Wilcox gives and—

"Rid your heart of all ill will—the ill will which begrudges any life its benefits, or wishes disaster upon every one—and fear nothing.

"Avoid people whom your best instincts and judgment tell you are not desirable associates, but send them good thoughts for a better life, and put away bitter enmity from your mind.

"We cannot love the unlovable, but we can wish them to become lovable, and mentally urge them to be so, instead of hating them for their repellant qualities. Fear no man's curse. It cannot cross the circle of Infinite Love unless you break the chain by thoughts of hate. If you go around clad in an armor of love toward all, you are absolutely safe; but if there is a weak spot in that armour (hate toward one person) you, like the chap in ancient history, who was shot in the heel, are liable to be vanquished."

"However skilled and strong art thou, my foe,
However fierce is thy relentless hate,
Though firm thy hand, and strong thy aim, and straight
Thy poisoned arrow leaves the bended bow
To pierce the target of my heart, ah! know
I am the master yet of my own fate.
Thou canst not rob me of my best estate,
Though fortune, fame, and friends, yea love, shall go.
"Not to the dust shall my true self be hurled;
Nor shall I meet thy worst assaults dismayed.
When all things in the balance are well weighed
There is but one great danger in the world—
Thou canst not force my soul to wish thee ill;
That is the only evil that can kill."

TO MY FATHER IN SPIRIT.

So thou art gone, thy destiny is not unknown;
Not in the embrace of darkest shadows grown,
But thou dost live in light of glorious grace,
That time or eternity cannot efface.
Not in shadows or in dark uncertain night,
Or in conditions that forever blight;
But by that law that worketh for every good,
That sanctifies and saves without shedding blood.
Thou shalt grow and live and bloom like flowers of field;
By the hand of God thy destiny is sealed;
Growth is that to which each and all must submit—
Lo! upon the pages of Nature it is writ.
Thy work upon this earth plane is not o'er,
Or thy work for human souls to be no more;
Everlasting shalt thou go on in thy way,
Working for all humanity day after day.
Others shalt follow. Thou shalt not be alone,
Works of love shall be the motto in thy home;
Unhampered by cares for material things,
Tolling for love is the song that ever rings.

CAN THE FUTURE BE FORETOLD?

A New Science

WHICH HAS STARTLED SOCIETY.

The Discoverer Tells How He Performs Modern Miracles Which Astound and Mystify Scientific Men.

R. F. ROBERTSON, Psych. D., C. D.

"It is a fact," says Mr. Robertson, "that important future events can be foretold. Also a man's secret nature, his talents and weaknesses are plainly recorded by the nerve cells in his hands, on his face; yes, he even betrays himself by his handwriting. I have explained the scientific reason for all this in my new book. I have told how any intelligent person may easily learn to read the secret natures of others; how to tell what vocation to follow so as to make the most money; how to develop a wonderfully magnetic personality; how to know whom to court and whom to shun; how to influence people; sell them goods; make them liberal with money; how to secure a good paying position without trouble; obtain an increase in salary and hundreds of things of vital importance to every ambitious man and woman. I gave away the copyright on my book on condition that 10,000 copies should be distributed to the public absolutely free. I am not egotistical, but my book explains a secret law which I know to be invaluable to those who wish to succeed in life. Several prominent ment have written me that it contains the very information for which they had been searching all their lives. I know there are hundreds and thousands of people struggling along who might enjoy the comforts of life and gratify their desires and ambitions if they only had the information imparted by my book, so I have decided that as many copies as possible shall be given away. If you want to know the real secret of personal control, if you wish to enjoy perfect health, if you would acquire wealth, or fame, if you would become a leader in your community, if there is anything in life that you would possess, write for a free copy of my book at once, it will prove invaluable to you, and you will thank the editor of this paper as long as you live for his generosity in publishing this article. If you want a book mention this paper and address the Columbia Scientific Academy, Depart. 159 A, 1931 Broadway, New York City.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD

A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

THE GOSPEL OF BUDDHA,

Is He a Reincarnation?

The Chicago Chronicle relates a peculiar case which, in the estimation of some, will be considered a clear case of reincarnation. Wizened and shriveled in body, half-starved and wearing rags that barely covered him, John George, fifteen years old, an ignorant orphan, son of a Pennsylvania coal miner, visited President Harper at the University of Chicago to find out whether he could complete a full course at the university on 25 cents. Obedient to the injunction of his dying mother, the boy had taken the fortune of $20 that she left him. With this money his mother told him to make a tour of the world and then spend the remainder in securing an education at the University of Chicago. Following instructions, the boy started on his trip around the world as soon as he had seen his mother buried. He set out westward, but found that he had only 30 cents when he arrived in Chicago. He thought that he had better go out to the university before he continued his trip, and when he called on M. H. MacLean, of the information office of the university, and asked him if he was President Harper, Mr. MacLean thought he was questioned by a maniac.

However, Mr. MacLean learned the boy was sane, but ignorant to an astounding degree, and sent him to a number of officials of the university, and finally to Assistant Dean Whaley, of the South Side Academy.

Though the boy arrived four weeks ago the matter had been kept secret until yesterday, when his marvelous progress became known.

John has proved himself an "intellectual freak." Though he knew nothing about reading or writing and could speak the English language only with difficulty, he has learned to read and write English and to speak French. The professors who have been helping the boy privately say that he is an "educational marvel."

Dean Whaley, of the academy, had the boy relate the history of his life in full. He told the dean that his father, a coal miner, was killed five years ago in a mine disaster. John then picked up bits of coal on the railway switches and blacked boots to help his invalid mother, who took in family washing. According to the boy's simple story he and his mother lived in a hovel.

For five years his mother cherished the hope that her boy should never go into the terrible coal mines and die there as his father had, but should see the world and gather wisdom. With this in view she had hoarded every penny she could. When she died a little over a month ago she called her son to her and said:

"'Tain't no place for you here, John. I want you to go away from this awful place and be with other kinds of people. Don't die in the mines, like your father. Take this money. It is all we have. Go around the world and see things and then go to the University of Chicago and spend the rest on your education."

John was the only mourner at the funeral. As the coffin was hid from sight tears of bitterness coursed his cheeks and a firm determination seized him to carry out the wishes of his mother. He started that night. His railroad ticket and his other expenses took all his money except three dimes by the time that he arrived in Chicago. Then he decided to go out and see the university before continuing his tour.

The starved condition of the boy aroused pity among the university officials and, while they knew he could not enter the freshman class, they wanted to help him. Assistant Dean Whaley, of the academy, took him, put him in a bathtub and gave him a new suit of clothes and food. The boy said he could not sleep because he was thinking about his college education. He had not slept for nearly three days and had been hungry two days.

It was not until he was installed as waiter at the French Club of the university that he began showing signs of precocity. Mme. Beauvais, the head of the French Club, noticed his brightness and his eagerness to learn.

In four weeks he has learned to read and write as well as any ordinary pupil in the fourth grade and has surprised Mme. Beauvais by speaking French with ease and fluency.

Professor Roy B. Keehn, of the academy, and Mr. Whaley say that the little coal miner is a "wonder," and that he will yet carry out his mother's wishes as to the college education, whether he goes around the world or not. Mme. Beauvais has been so much impressed with John George that she has given him a permanent home.

Here we have the product of two intensely ignorant parents. Poorly dressed, half-starved and uncouth in appearance, he stood before the Professors of the university an enigma that they could not at first solve. They kindly took him in, sheltered him, fed him and clothed him, and to-day he stands forth an intellectual marvel. Like all other geniuses he originates from the very humble walks of life, an illustration of the mysterious working of omnipresent forces on the material and spiritual side of life.

"Human Culture and Cure. Part First. The Philosophy of Cure. (Including Methods and Instruments." By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL. D. A very instructive and valuable work. It should have a wide circulation, as it well fulfills the promise of its title. For sale at this office. Price 75 cents.

Your Attention, Please.

The camp-meeting season will soon be over and we hope the Spiritualists who enjoy such an outing reached the acme of their anticipations of pleasant new acquaintances and old-fashioned visits with loving friends, with the recreation and rejuvenation of the body and the feast of soul. We hope everyone who went to camp received some benefit therefrom, spiritually, mentally and physically; received a baptism of knowledge that will lead them into the higher pursuits of happiness and usefulness, and while full to overflowing with the holy spirit, with the spirit of enthusiasm and progress, they will give us their attention. We have something to tell them from week to week that will touch a responsive chord and keep the enthusiasm ever fresh and pure.

If your soul has been enriched with the sweetness of song and eloquence, let us keep you in that mode throughout the year.

While the rostrum teachers have been sounding the praise of the cause and giving you the vocalized philosophy, The Progressive Thinker hasn't been on a vacation, but has been full of its usual interesting philosophical, scientific and historical articles, and is always full of enthusiasm.

We have both good and bad reports from the camps. That is, we have reports of the awakening effect of the camp-meetings generally, upon Spiritualists who had found the fact and long since retired into the sunlight of the knowledge, thinking they had found all that was worth knowing; reports of the greatly increased attendance by the general public; the good financial outlook and the good time all around; and of the brotherly feeling engendered and perpetuated by these meetings.

Again, we have reports that, owing to the class of people who are attracted from the vicinities surrounding the camps, and the charlatans who rush there to make money, they are very demoralizing, especially to the young.

No doubt, to a certain extent both reports are true. One thing is apparent, and that is, that Spiritualism at the camps as well as in the field at large, is represented and controlled by honest, intelligent, clean and earnest advocates, and the lack of discrimination between the good and bad effects of the average camp-meeting is human and human only.

Spiritualism does not even try to find out the kind and character of men and women, or the kind and character of its presentations to man's perception, at the camp-meetings, but she goes there in all her grandeur and purity, in all her truth and stability, in all her simplicity and naturalness, in all her love and broadness and appeals to men and women according to their inclinations and receptivity. She leaves an impression wherever she goes, and that impression is for the ultimate good of the human race, for the upliftment and unfoldment of man's higher self.

What you saw at camp, and more, we present to our readers through the year, fifty-two weeks out of every year of passing time, and shall continue to do so as long as we get the expressed appreciation that is shown at present and that has been shown from the start; but our cause is growing, through these various instrumentalities, and the circulation of the Spiritual papers should be the index to that increase, to that spread that we know the cause is having.

If we had the power that we have feeling for the cause we would make every camp a perfect paradise for the commingling of the mortal and immortal; we would have beautiful flowers and sweet singing birds; we would have the best orchestras and quartets, the best speakers, the genuine mediums and attract by making perfect conditions, none from either side of life but the pure and irreproachable; but we have not such power and therefore must continue to receive a few bad reports of these generally harmonious and very social camp-meetings.

But when you get back home to your cold, humdrum worldly affairs and begin to feel lost without the volumes of eloquence, feel the lack of soul food you so appreciated at the camp, just pick up The Progressive Thinker, if you have one handy, or send for a sample copy, and begin living all those beautiful thoughts over and over each week. Come into our paradise of thought and we will entertain you at least the other eleven months of the year with our orchestra of eloquence by the ablest masters of science and spiritual thought, and with our sweet singing birds of poetry.

If you are new in the cause and still in the primary class of investigation, proceed cautiously, for there are pitfalls to fall into and obstacles to overcome, and those who have passed along the same road ahead of you will be glad to aid you in your search for truth and knowledge.

Read; examine; inquire of those old writers who have traveled this way and who are a part of the life and progress of The Progressive Thinker, and Spiritualism. Let your mind go ahead of your body. Let the experience of others be your guide and you will have cause to be happy, and satisfied to live the truth you have found.,

A "What Is It?"

Several of our correspondents have written inquiring concerning The Magazine of Mysteries, a magazine of peculiar characteristics, published in New York City.

We have often felt as much mystified as our correspondents, when noting the very peculiar quality of the mental hash served up by the said magazine, and have wondered what was the matter with it. What Spiritualism there is about it is overslaughed with a sickish, goody-goody sort of piety or canting religiousness, that is offensive to healthy Spiritualists, and we venture to say that no Spiritualist subscribed for it with the expectation of receiving such a mess as is doled out by the "Mystics" in every issue.

On the whole we should incline to the opinion that the Magazine of Mysteries is under the control of a lot of Romish Jesuits, whose purpose is to deceive Spiritualists and shyly inject churchly notions, in the guise of Spiritualism.

Certainly very much of the matter the Magazine publishes is not the sort of reading that Spiritualists care to waste much of their precious time over.

There are straight-out, genuine Spiritualist papers for Spiritualists, and they have no need of, nor use for a nondescript paper such as The Magazine of Mysteries.

Two Notables.

Hon. Alonzo Thompson and Col. R. T. Van Horn passed through Chicago on their way home from Lily Dale Camp. Both pronounce the camp a success.

OFFERS TO PROVE THAT MAN LIVES AFTER DEATH

What is known as supernatural [as set forth in the Chicago Herald] may be described as an effect caused through the operation of laws unknown to science.

As science is continually delving deeper and becoming familiar with laws in nature heretofore unknown, what was considered a phenomenon yesterday, or perhaps a miracle, is looked upon to-day with no feeling of superstition or fear, because the law by which it is produced is known and understood.

Science means methodical knowledge, and the field of knowledge is so cast that no one human mind is capable of grasping but a small proportion.

A man may become an advanced scientist in some one department and at the same time be comparatively an ignoramus in some other.

A notable instance may be found in the case of Dr. Hudson, who having made some progress in one department, being wise in his own conceit, led him to the belief that he could pose as authority in almost any other, prompting him to publish a work entitled "Psychic Phenomena," which has put more kinks in men's minds than anything published for many years.

The amusing feature about it is that intelligent persons can read the work without realizing the ridiculous position the doctor has placed himself in by trying to pose as authority and explain a thing he has never seen, as he acknowledges in his work that the only phenomenon he ever witnessed was an indifferent case of automatic slate-writing.

BELIEF IN FUTURE LIFE.

All religions, either of the past or present, are based upon the belief that man lives after death.

The peculiarity of the human family is, that when material things are considered man retains his rationality and will seek to reason from cause to effect, but the moment his mind seeks to grasp the occult or spiritual he immediately runs off on a tangent of irrational superstitions and beliefs.

As an illustration. When a mother murders her child she is at once pronounced insane. Why? Because all nature teaches that the mother in her sane moments would sacrifice her own life before that of the child.

Now, if there be life after death, all nature teaches that if a mother is separated from her children by death she would naturallly in spirit still hover about her loved ones.

In view of the teachings of nature on all sides it would be rational and reasonable to believe that she does, providing one believes in a future life.

Now after more than a quarter of a century's scientific investigation through every department of science bearing upon the subject, I am prepared not only to affirm that man lives after death, but to scientifically demonstrate beyond the possibility of a doubt that he can be communicated with in at least eight different ways, and that each form of communication is produced through the operation of unvarying occult laws.

I furthermore affirm that the so-called dead are far more alive than when in the flesh, because when relieved from the flesh they are on a higher plane of vibration, and, like the light that comes from a star 400 trillions of miles away, their sensibilities annihilate space.

You cannot demonstrate a sum in algebra to a person who has never made a study of that branch of mathematics, and neither can you demonstrate an occult problem to a person who does not know the difference between a light and a sound vibration.

The peculiarity of the average man is that he will spend three years in learning a trade or profession deeming it necessary, but when it comes to the occult, if he cannot master it in a half hour's investigation he turns back to his potatoes and cabbage.

PHENOMENA EXPLAINED.

Man is a spirit, incarnated in matter. He is like a violin covered with pitch, the pitch deadening the vibration of the sounding-board, muffles the so-called music.

The flesh in which man is incarnated like the pitch on the violin, deadens his vibration, and therefore his sensibilities, while spirit, being free from flesh dwells upon a higher plane.

What is known as phenomena is either spirit functioning upon the material, or man while incarnated in matter functioning upon the spiritual plane.

Being upon different planes, one can function only through the aid of the other, that is to say; that spirit being upon a high plane of vibration, like X-rays, cannot see matter, because he sees right through it, hence cannot see it as man sees it except through the eyes of a medium, while on the other hand, man being upon a low plane, cannot see spiritual things except through the mediumship of a spirit.

The process by which this is accomplished is the same in principle as that employed in wireless telegraphing, also in mind telepathy, i. e., the harmony and affinity of vibration.

In wireless telegraphing, both instruments must be adjusted to the same number of vibrations per second, say 20,000,000, as like vibration produces like vibration.

CLAIRVOYANCE EASY.

Almost any person can have the clairvoyant power, providing some spirit comes along whose spiritual sight power is in harmonious vibration with his own, or which becomes so after long association, which among Spiritualists is known as developing.

The success of the phenomenon depends, like wireless telegraphing, upon the complete harmony of vibration between the medium and spirit.

This explains why the so-called mediumistic power comes and goes.

It is because the spirit comes and goes, and is not always present, for like mortals they often have many engagements to keep.

In clairaudience the same principle is involved and requires no further explanation except that sound is upon a lower plane of vibration than light.

What is known as trance mediumship is merely hypnotism, the hypnotizing and using the organism of the medium to communicate with those upon the material plane.

Those desiring to understand the occult should first familiarize themselves with the following scale, viz.:

Nerve sensation travels at the slow pace of only 111 feet per second.

Sound—Man is oblivious to any atmospheric or sound vibration under sixteen per second or over 32,000 per second. The "A" tuning fork throws of 435 vibrations per second.

Electrical vibrations range from 5,000,000 to about 5,000,000,000. When above that, say at 30 trillions ethereal vibrations, it takes the form of heat.

Light vibrations range from 30 to 1,800 trillions per second, while the eye of man cannot catch those above 750 trillions.

X-Rays are in the sextillions.

Spiritual sound is supposed to be in the regions between electricity and heat, and spiritual sight to be between those of light and X-rays.

As we delve deeper into nature's laws our superstitions and belief in the miraculous disappear, and we produce the so-called phenomena ourselves without fear of man or the devil.

As we go deeper, however, we lose respect for those who use prefixes and affixes to their names, as we realize they are very ignorant on the very subject they seek to pose as authority and teachers.

The Bible Too Immoral to Be Printed in a Newspaper.

Carleton F. Hodge, editor of the Assumption (Ill.) Independent, is threatened with prosecution for publishing improper literature because he has undertaken to print the Bible in his newspaper. When he had reached the 54th chapter of Genesis in the publication of the Bible on the weekly installment plan Mr. Hodge received a letter from a prominent official of the St. Joseph County Savings Bank at South Bend, Ind., informing him that the appearance of such "matter" in a newspaper was illegal and he threatened to start a lawsuit.

Editor Hodge, who came to Chicago lately, said he proposed to continue printing a chapter of the Bible each week in his paper despite this threat. At this rate it will take more than fifty years to complete the work. Mr. Hodge will be 91 years old if he lives to see the completion of the task undertaken five weeks ago. Providing, also, the South Bend man does not secure an injuction.

"It is to the chapters on Genesis and Deuteronomy that the bank official objects," said Mr. Hodge. "He wrote me a letter saying there were spots and places in the Bible that were not fit to be put before the public for perusal. For my part I consider anything that is fit to be the basis of Christianity and to be taught to the children in the Sunday schools is good enough to be submitted to newspaper readers along with news items of the day."

"Is the Assumption Independent partial to sensational news—crimes?" was asked.

"Yes; the paper has always 'played' that class of news." He produced the latest copy of the Independent. The front page headlines read as follows across the top of the page:

"Train Collided with Box Car."
"Those Merry Wedding Bells."
"Sunday's Storm Did Damage."
"The Holy Bible."

The last article occupies the two right-hand columns, being "the King James version, the first book of Moses, called Genesis."

"What will the next chapter be?" Editor Hodge was asked.

"Now you've got me—I haven't read proof on next Friday's edition. What is the next chapter, anyway? I'm not an expert in biblical research," continued the editor. "The way I happened to start this Bible printing was that one night several young fellows of the town were in the Independent office with my brother, J. Sim Hodge, who helps me publish the paper, and we got into an argument over some question in the Bible. I decided that the Bible was all news to the vast masses of the people and decided to print it—distribute Christianity on the installment plan, as it were—for I am convinced that the copies of my paper reach people who would never see a copy of the holy script from one year's end to another."

Editor Hodge said that he and his brother were reading proof one Thursday night for the next day's edition. Several townsmen came in to have some notices "wrote up" and this is what they heard uttered in a dull monotone:

"27. And all the days of Methuselah were nine hundred and sixty-nine [spell it out]; and he died.

"28. And Lamech lived an hundred eighty and two years, and begat a son:

"29. And he called his name Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed."

"Just then," said Mr. Hodge, "my brother, who was doing all this, laid down his cigar and looked around. All three of our visitors were standing with their hats off—a thing almost unprecedented in the Independent office.

"'Holdin' prayer meetin'?' says one of them.

"'Reading proof!' I said.

"'Well, now, we thought you was doin' some sort of responsive readin',' "

And Mr. Hodge says he will keep on printing the Bible—if he lives.

The above from the Chicago Daily News illustrates an important point which anyone can see without explanation.

CARDINAL WOLSEY

Forced by a Natural Law to Return and Preach the Truth.

Truth crushed to earth will rise again, and those who do crush it are forced by a natural law to return from the sphere beyond the grave and undo the wrong they did whilst in the physical body.

It was at a private class held by Mr. J. Clegg Wright last winter at Lake Helen, Fla., that Cardinal Wolsey, who died in 1830, was given the privilege to manipulate the switchboard of the nervous system of the medium and forced to speak about as follows:

"The soul of man is the infinite dignity and power which can in its radiant essential entity of itself 'know,' because it is infinite, and therefore in close relation to the infinite vibrations of the unknowable, universal, infinite soul, the All in All. It is a personal, creative, mind or thought power, intelligence, eon or divinity of the sphere of the divine soul, perhaps better understood by you by the name of deity or God. Deity is the sphere of divinity acting in and through all the universe.

"That the soul of man is a part of this Deity is proven by the numberless historical curses effected on or through the holy shrines.

"I, personally, when on earth have seen hundreds of sick people kneeling down and praying for health, arise from the holy shrine at Canterbury, being healed.

"How were they healed? By a miracle? No! They were cured by faith in a most natural way. By the action of Great Spiritual minds gathering over the holy shrine for the purpose of relieving mankind from their ills and thus proving unto them the relativity of their indwelling spirit with the assembled healing spirits.

"It is a natural electric magnetic process; it is the power of the spirit over the nervous system of man. The nerves in the physical body regulate the circulation of the blood and lymphatics, and in turn they are subject to influences outside of the human senses; influences which even in your enlightened age are not yet understood. I mean the soul's creative power or the power to control etheric molecules, the substance of which nerve tissues and nerve power is made.

"It is a fact that departed spirits can act on the mental state of man, that dominating impressions are given by them to the consciousness of man and thus man's life is molded to a great extent by the denizens of the unseen world. A good deal of the phenomena and of the evolution of life must be attributed to spirit power.

"This universal spirit power can heal the sick if the spirit of the patient can come into close relativity with the healing spirits. The earnest prayers of those kneeling at the holy shrine of Canterbury established that relativity and they could arise cured.

"So it was not the power of the Catholic church that cured them, but their own faith acting the same as Christian Science does to-day. It is not a supernatural power but a simple natural process not understood by man.

"The Catholic church created saints for a purpose which was pure and holy. In the beginning of the Christian era the mental development of the people was very low. So the saints were created by the church to inspire dignity and holiness in the hearts of the masses, to assist the holy spirit within man to dominate over the human senses and thus raise the ethics and morals of mankind. The masses could not grasp the conception of a Deity, so the saints were put forth as a sample of dignity, a step to Deity, an example to be looked up to and to be followed in life. These saints were men as other men, yet they awakened with their exemplary life the spirit in the masses, the holiness of the spirit in mankind; for the spirit in man is the holy spirit; it is man's guardian, it is the healing spirit in the physical body.

"So the saints were not created as an abstract of worship or divinity in themselves as understood by the masses of to-day, but simply to exemplify the higher, the better life to the ignorant masses and lift them out of their low mental and moral condition.

"Another gross misappropriation that manifests itself to-day in the Catholic church is the confession.

"Confession means the help of the priest to pray with the poor in mind who cannot grasp the deity within themselves so as to establish in their minds the relationship of the indwelling soul with God.

"I, a former Cardinal and Archbishop of Canterbury, am forced by a natural law to give these truths to you to undo the karma which I have made when on earth.

"A wrong done to others is a greater wrong to yourself; for every wrong is a barrier to your future progression. You cannot move on until you have removed that barrier. Therefore I come back and lecture to you through this medium, to undo the wrong of my past. I cannot move on until I have removed that barrier created by myself in earth-life.

"Man dies, but his thoughts, words and actions live after his physical death. It is the karma of his earth-life and is subject to the natural laws in the spiritual world, which laws force him in their evolutionary actions to scatter and demolish everything in his karma which is contrary to truth. So I must scatter all ideas of vicarious atonement. There is no such thing, it is a wrong thought and a cruel teaching. But since thought is eternal we must give forth the truth, we must help truth to overcome untruth, for in the eternal presence truth must ever be victorious.

"Therefore you must think right in order to do right. Let your thoughts always be on the highest plane and your karma will not be a barrier to your progression, you will not have to undo the past. Sin not and you need not have forgiveness of sin. Cause and effect is a truth; vicarious atonement a cruel lie.

"How can you thus improve? By meditation in spiritual solitude.

"Hope is the scaffolding of the soul. It will lead you to the father, and when you have found the father you will be saved.

"I and the father are one, for the soul in man is the father of the human mind.

"As a mind I say my trade or my duty is 'to express' the father which is in me and to bear witness that I am in him.

"When we have found our father, we will be changed as the field of Ardath was changed. Our lives will not be barren fields of stone, but full of loving deeds and kind thoughts, without any barrier to eternal progression."

The Conflict in France.

In the Chicago Record Herald of Aug. 29, the Rev. Henry O. M. Chapuis, S. S., A. M., Procurator Divinity College, Catholic University of America, gives a lengthy exposition of the Catholic view of the present trouble in France over the school question.

It is needless to present here the Catholic view, in extenso. Suffice it to say that, according to the Rev. Chapuis' own showing, the whole matter hinges on the Catholic wish and determination to dominate the education of the people and make the same distinctly religious according to the Romish idea. The schools must be under the care and keeping of the church, and must be thoroughly Romanized. The education must be a Romish education, the principal purpose to make Catholics.

The French Republic, in order to remain a republic, and be such in fact, could not assent to these ideas of education, and hence must make the schools secular.

Thence comes the clash between the government of the republic and the Romish element—and the latter has been compelled to give way.

Of course Romish clerics feel very sore over the matter, because they are thereby shorn of much of their power, and a great source of their strength.

What Rome loses, Freedom gains.

UNDYING.

We cannot doubt that those who leave this earth
For other life beyond our world and ken
Still have an influence for good or ill
Upon the lives and the affairs of men;
And, as we are, so will this influence be
For love and justice, Mercy, truth, and right,
Or falsehood, strife, oppression, hate, and wrong,
And whether good or ill, strong in its might.

Evil will come, but not unwelcomed stay;
Good cannot linger when repulsed, unsought:
The choice is free to harbor spirits dark,
Or those whose coming is with blessing fraught.
Dear Hearts, our loved whom falsely we call 'dead,'
Keep hand in hand with us the earthly way:
Heaven is not far—a little sleep, and then
We cannot lose thee in the sweet for aye.

The Horse—Equus or Equinus.

What place has the horse in history? Whether that question can be answered or not, we have an early reference to the horse in the time of Alexander the Great. Bucephalus, a horse belonging to that potentate, who it is said, would not let anyone else bestride him. Bucephalus means bull-headed. Perhaps a Latin word or name. The head of this famous animal was shaped like that of the bull, hence its adoption. This fact indicates that bucephalus was poorly bred, being of inferior or scrub stock.

Arabia has been long celebrated for its finely-bred stock of horses. The Arab's taste went to saddle horses, perhaps also those for the carriage. But I believe Normandy eclipses all others in fine carriage horses.

The horse has gained a strong hold on the affections and economy of the human race, above that of all other animals that can be found in history. Of all animals none show the strong trait of fidelity equal to that of the dog. Can't say whether the horse or the elephant should be named next.

The newspapers report a trustworthy incident in that of a horse.

A man in a state of intoxication in the winter time fell from his horse and froze to death. His faithful equine walked about in the snow, as if waiting for the man to get up. At length a person came along and mounted the horse, but the conscientious brute refused to budge a foot until he saw his master lifted to be carried away. It is a pity that this pathetic incident was not supplied with names, place and date.

As animals commit suicide, it shows they have knowledge of the fact of death. That this knowledge or fact should indicate or teach them an after life, is extremely doubtful.

A farmer in Pasadena, Cal., Mr. McKenzie, had a perilous adventure.

He one morning went among his live stock and met a young bull. He stopped and began picking burrs from the foretop of the bull's head. Without sign or provocation the ugly brute charged on its owner, knocked him down and tried to gore him with his horns. The man's fall and danger was noticed by a favorite mare with her colt feeding not far away. They at once came running with all speed to McKenzie's rescue. With teeth, hoofs, and heels they beat the treacherous beast off and drove him away.

When McKenzie recovered consciousness, he felt the sympathetic colt's soft, velvet-like nose rubbing against his face, as much as to say, 'We are sorry for you, and came to you as quick as we could."

To my view this horse episode is a most remarkable incident of animal perception and lively sympathy for man.

Query? What is the reason and philosophy of this spontaneous act of friendly help? Can we not explain this equine interference by reference to unseen spirit assistance actuating the motives and temper of that clever mare with her colt?

When General Sherman visited the Pacific Coast, the party stopped at Virginia City. A man got out for a moment at a retreat, when he was attacked by a savage watch-dog. The man had no means of defense, but at that instant a large cat sprang out from under a porch and fastened her claws and teeth upon the offensive dog. The dog let go of the traveler which allowed him to escape and return to the waiting train. How shall this case of rescue be explained, except as in the above sample of unseen spirit influence and helpful interference? Our spirit friends are ever about us and they are ever ready and only too glad for an occasion to do some helpful service for others as well as for themselves. It is an axiom that to help others, you help yourself.

Altruism points to the other man, before yourself heaves in sight.

AN ANGEL DISGUISED AS A MORTAL.

He Works in the Slums, Redeems the Bad, and Assists the Good—A Veritable Angel on Earth.

Probably the name of Dr. Thomas J. Barnardo, of London, Eng., is almost unknown in America, but it deserves to become more familiar, for the doctor is one of the men who are really doing great things for the poor of London and doing it in ways that are interesting to hear about, says a special correspondent to the Globe-Democrat.

An article about him is timely just now, for "The Dr. Barnardo Homes" as they are known all over England, celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their foundation recently, being visited on that felicitous occasion by the Princess Henry of Battenberg.

Unlike the Salvation Army and other charitable societies, Dr. Barnardo devotes his whole attention to looking out for poor children. He has a little army of experienced "searchers" in London and throughout the provinces who visit cheap lodging houses, tramps' kitchens, casual wards and slums looking for waifs. When the children are found the doctor takes them into his homes and proceeds to make good citizens out of them by teaching the boys trades and training the girls for business and as housewives.

All this may not seem especially remarkable. The unusual part of it is, however, the scale on which Dr. Barnardo's work is done. In the 36 years that he has been collecting little waifs and strays, over 45,500 have graduated from his homes. The doctor began his efforts in a mere shed in the heart of a slum—he now carries on 101 separate homes and eleven mission branches. Last year he took in over 14,000 children, of whom 314 were under five years old.,

When the boys and girls have gotten so far along in their education that the doctor feels that they are capable of making their way in the world, he sends them off to Canada—having an agreement to that end with the Canadian government. Among the children at the homes who marched past the sweet-faced princess, the other day, were 400 who were to leave for the dominion on the following Saturday. All told, 12,045 boys and girls have gone to Canada—and probably afterward down into the United States—from the Barnardo homes, and of this number, according to official statistics furnished the doctor by the Canadian government, less than 2 per cent have been failures. Some of them are doctors, others lawyers, clergymen, newspaper writers, and what not. One of the members of a Colonial Senate who welcomed the Prince and Princess of Wales during their tour in the Ophir started out as a Barnardo slum boy. From these invariably grateful former waifs the doctor receives by way of donations over $5,000 every year.

Voluntary subscriptions are the sole source of the Barnardo homes' income, which amounts in a year to $725,000. The way in which these homes were started is interesting. Dr. Barnardo had at first no idea of becoming a philanthropist. But even while a struggling, medical student his tendency for helping other people manifested itself, and the young embryo physician started a sort of evening class for boys and managed to coax several ragged little urchins with whom he had got on terms of intimacy to join it. Sessions were held in the slum building before mentioned. When the lessons were over one evening the raggedest and most forlorn of the boys showed some reluctance about "going out into the night." He wanted to lie by the doctor's fire.

"But," said the doctor, "my lad, it's time to go home. Where do you live?"

"Don't live nowhere, sir," the boy admitted. He told Dr. Barnardo, too, that there were a good many other boys and girls that he knew that "didn't live nowhere," either, and volunteered to show his friend where his unlucky little acquaintances spent their nights. So the doctor went with him, and Jimmy Jervis pointed out the various stairways, halls and alleys which served as the out-of-door bedrooms of a few of London's stray children, and when that night's round was over the medical profession had lost a promising recruit. Dr. Barnardo had determined to look out for the waifs.

The doctor is one of the probably few men in the world who do a regular business in babies. The doctor often buys babies. Sometimes that is the only way to get them from the mothers, who do them much more harm than good. Dr. Barnardo has no "fixed rate" for babies. Recently he bought two for $1.75, but they are usually rather more expensive. The other day, for instance, a not particular enticing baby cost the doctor $2. Its mother was in jail for assault, not being able to pay her fine, which amounted to that sum, and she offered to turn all rights in her offspring over to the doctor if he would advance the money necessary for her release.

Not long ago a baby was received into the special babies' home, but in spite of being well fed and taken care of it didn't seem to take the slightest interest in the things about it. Then it was discovered that the baby was blind—blind because one day when its amiable mother came home drunk she had stuck a sharp darning needle through the center of both of its eyes. Dr. Barnardo can tell many another story as unpleasant about the "past" of some of the babies to whom he is now acting as a second mother. He brings them up to be healthy boys and girls and then trains them as he does all of his proteges.

By birth, Dr. Barnardo is half Irish and half Spanish. He looks more like a bustling, prosperous business man than like a philanthropist, for he is short and stout, with rather heavy "mutton-chop" whiskers. For the last year or two he has had to take things rather easier and allow his many assistants to do more and more of the actual work connected with his homes, for his life of strain and activity has brought heart disease upon him. For years at the beginning of his work among the waifs he began the day at 8 o'clock in the morning and caught a train home at 11 at night.

Such humanitarian work commends itself to every one who has the good of humanity at heart; it is noble, elevating, spiritualizing, tending to lift the world to a higher plane, and, as such its beneficent results are in harmony with the teachings and philosophy of Spiritualism. It would be well for our cause if Spiritualists could show more of such work done by its adherents, and the world would be the better for it.

Why Is the Christian Religion Declining?

In the Sunday Press of June 29, Rev. G. Campbell Morgan contributed an article under the caption "Is Religion Declining," in which he rightfully concludes: "It seems to be incontrovertible that there has been for many years a religious declension in the United States. This declension has covered both faith and practice." This retrogression is attributed "very largely" to "indifferentism and the wandering of the heart from God, to the unexampled activity of the mind in other directions, such as inventions, financial, manufactures and commerce. The world has been for years science-crazy and money-crazy, and religion in any form has been temporarily crowded out of its mind." He further, and rather paradoxically, observes that "the very universality of this movement is not specially a rational rejection of Christianity." If this is meant to apply to the religious system founded by Jesus Christ and what little of it has been permitted to trickle down through the ages in spite of theology and religious bigotry, it is correct. But the Christianity of the schools, as it is known and applied, has declined and is being rejected for the very rational reason that it has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. It is the product of human agencies and inventions—the Dead Hand of the Past trying to fasten the inane creeds created by the disintegrated brains of the Church Fathers, upon the present generation and hold it among the crude environments of the dawn of history.

The writer has no quarrel with genuine Christianity. We believe when rid of redundances, cleared of contemporary errors, properly understood and applied, it is the hope of the world. We also believe that there are to-day millions of good men and women wearing the breast-plate of righteousness, whose lives are an inspiration in making the world better—in spite of theology. But to the vast majority of people the religious system known as Christianity presents so many contradictions and inconsistencies that it is a hopeless enigma. Yet the Savior's plan was so plain that "a wayfaring man need not err therein." It does not seem to occur to most religious enthusiasts that there may be something radically wrong with the present religious system causing this "mere indifferentism" and rejection of Christianity, which to them is the same as repudiating the creeds, dogmas and theological vagaries of the church. There are persons who would reject Christianity or any other religion for reasons assigned by Mr. Morgan, but it is not admitted that three-fourths of the people of the United States are actuated by such motives in their indifferentism and rejection of so-called Christianity. In the repudiation ranks are millions of the best, noblest and most intelligent men and women that ever lived. It will not do to say that all this vast army of dissenters is simply selfish, dishonest and indifferent. There are causes for this declension of theological Christianity traceable to entirely different sources, we think, than those assigned by Mr. Morgan. To ascertain these is the object of this inquiry.

TRUE CHRISTIANITY.

Let us first, then, try to get a conception of the fundamental principles of the system under consideration. The Christianity of the Christ favors no school of thought; it connects itself with no ecclesiasticism; it is joined to no philosophy; it depends for its advancement upon the facility of no creed. It welcomes with outstretched arms, to the companionship of its endeavors, its hopes and its fruition, those who would live rightly. The whole scope and object of it is to show us how to become better men and women, nobler husbands, truer wives, happier children, more loving parents, warmer friends. To reach this goal its heroic spirits have met freely and fearlessly, pain and death in the cause of human rights. On the other hand, theological Christianity is the creation of man. It is nothing more than a vast system of intellectualism masquerading in the garb of genuine Christianity on which it was grafted at the time of the latter's inception giving rise to the Christianity of the schools. It is a huge attempt of the human mind, through eighteen centuries, to make man understand God and his relation to him. It negatives Christianity, hence, the churches have always been more theologic than religious. Its mission was not to bring "peace on earth and good will to men," but for selfish purposes, to conquer and hold in subjection, by submissive ignorance, if it could, by fire and the sword if it must. Instead of being a personification of life, love, fraternity and service, it has been the consistent enemy of the human race. The answer to its mission is written by bleaching bones on countless battle-fields; the decimation of nations; autos-da-fe; rack and dungeon; and on the lurid sky reflecting the flames of a million fagot-piles where strong men and women writhed in agony. It has been a failure and will ever be. These are serious charges. Are they true?

"By their fruits ye shall know them." Let us see, then, what the religion of man-made creeds and ecclesiastical dogmas have done in the evangelization of the world. During the middle ages all the philosophy and science of the civilized as well as its arts and music, were subservient to the church, and dared to think and work only within the limits of its dogmas. It owned the thrones of kings and emperors, the spade and plow of the squalid peasantry, and almost the fee simple of the soil. The people were not governed by intelligence but by threats and promises, rewards and punishments. The world was covered with huts and hovels for the many, palaces and cathedrals for the few. To nearly all the children of men reading and writing were unknown arts. The poor were clad in rags and skins—they devoured crusts and gnawed bones. Their destiny was to toil and obey—to work and want. The poor peasant divided his earnings with the state, because he imagined it protected his body. He divided his crust with the church because he imagined it protected his soul. He was the prey of throne and altar. He was taught to hate the people of other nations and despise the believers in all other religions. The voices of progress were hushed in the silence of dungeons and sepulchers. The despotism of theology had done its work. But at last the day of science dawned and earth's benighted millions awoke to front the dawn of a better day and take up the long and weary march out of fens and bog-lands of ignorance, bondage and superstition. The luxury of a century ago are the necessities of to-day. But above all, and over all, is the development of the mind. These gifts are not the gifts of speculative Christian theology. They are the children of freedom, the gifts of reason, observation and experience. Theology, as of old, still denounces the crazy world of science and free thought. But the spread of intelligence and education have so modified theology as to deprive it of its old time harm, but it has not ceased its struggle for supremacy. It still delights to persecute for heresy(?) so far as it can, those who openly oppose its dogmas. It's the same old feud—the past struggling with the future, departing night battling with the dawn.

THE MARCH OF SCIENCE.

While science and unfettered thought have moved us a long ways up from the quaking boglands of intellectual night, we are yet standing in the retreating shadows and blighting influences of the dark ages. But the trend is upward. The magic key of science has unlocked the portals of progress. What was once myth, miracle and prodigy, have faded before the light of science which reveals fixed laws and a stated order of nature. The clouds which hung over the creation have scattered. The heavens, the earth, the plants and the human frame, now that they are explored by science, speak of God as they never did before. The mysteries of the physical world are cleared up. The invention of the printing press, gunpowder, telegraph and railway have made it possible to explore the whole world. To-day all lands are visited, all languages are studied, all Scriptures are read. The ruins and relics of antiquity have surrendered their secrets. And, beyond our little planet, the universe has been reduced to order and many of its mighty laws comprehended. Discoveries in astronomy, geology, biology, archaeology, etc., have completely demolished many of the old-time beliefs of our fathers, the traditions of ages, the oracles which from early infancy they learned to revere and hold most sacred, and regard as divine truth. Scientific historical and literary criticism have thrown overboard many of the monstrous accumulations of human guesses and judgments, opinions and influences, interpretations and conclusions, which by the ignorant and learned alike have been heaped upon the life of Jesus of Nazareth. The critical spirit of our age, the inquiring condition of human thought, is distinctly a mark of human growth and stands in bold antithesis to the dark ages of mental stagnation when speculation and progress were outlawed in many fields of research and spiritually suffered an eclipse behind the form, pomp and show of theology.

Let us bring the matter nearer home. Look at the moral condition of the world to-day—the civilized world, and recall that it is nearly 2,000 years since Jesus lived. He came to bring peace into the world, and the world is filled with war. Look at the so-called Christian nations. Their boundaries bristle with bayonets as well-trimmed hedges with thorns. He came to introduce the era of forgiveness. What nation or race has learned the lesson? He came to redeem society from selfishness. But when was society ever more selfish than now? Men, under the reign of his ideas, were to love God with all their hearts, and their neighbors as themselves. Where will you find a community thus inspired? His followers were to be lowly-minded and humble. Look at their robes, their mitres, their crowns, their signet rings, their titles of honor and their thirst for these. The old earth is earthly still; the human race is human still. The perfection of heaven is still confined to heaven. The divinity of the skies still keeps its throne above the stars. The perfectness of God is not in man, nor his royalty enthroned at the head of nations. Two thousand years have passed and Christianity has not triumphed. Why? Dr. Robinson has said: "The God of the mere theologian is scarcely a living God. He did live; but for some 1800 years we are credibly informed that no trace of his life has been seen. The canon is closed. The proofs that he was are in the things that he has made, and the books of men to whom he spake, but he inspires and works wonders no more. According to the theologians he gives proof of design instead of God, doctrines instead of the life indeed." Terser, truer words, were never uttered. Abby M. Diaz, writing on "Hindrances to World Betterment," in July Mind, says: "If we could only Christianize the Christians and make respectability respectable we would soon be done building jails for our common offenders." Here we have two observations which contain in a nutshell much food for reflection for those who are solving the problems of indifferentism and turning away from theological churchianity.

THE CHURCH AND REFORMS.

Let us briefly inquire into the attitude of the church towards recent reforms. Take the anti-slavery cause. The Stars and Stripes were flung to the breeze from a staff fixed in the firm basis of equality, liberty and justice, yet we had within our borders in 1860 four million chattel slaves! Just think of a system of government in a professedly Christian country that dehumanized man into personal chattels. A system that herded negroes together as swine-herd; changed marriage into prostitution, and made every plantation a brothel. A system that stripped a rational, moral human being, created in God's own image, of the fundamental right to inquire into, consult and seek his own happiness, and degraded him mentally, morally and physically beneath the brute. Of course the pulpit of the day denounced this monstrous system, did it not? No; with few honorable exceptions, the recreant clergy clinging to dogmas, afraid of investigation, preaching half truths, presenting a narrow Gospel, unwilling humbly to confess error, uttering cant, bowing the knee to Baal, and with creeds of iron, looked unmoved and approvingly on the physical, mental, moral and spiritual degradation of four million human beings because burned by a fiercer sun. To heighten the irony of the situation, the preacher read out of the church hymnal and with the congregation sang the national anthem, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee, Sweet Land of Liberty, etc." And in the next breath defended, through thick and thin, the buying and selling of women and babes and filled the mouths of slave-traders with passages of Scripture defending and upholding traffic in human flesh. At the same time the church branded the Abolitionists as fanatics, meddling with what did not concern them, and anathematized them as infidels assaulting the order of providence. Yes, slavery was a divine institution. Under the direction of a theoretical providence, supported by the pulpit, and protected by infamous laws, the lash, blood-hound and shotgun, it was secure—till wiped out by bloody war. It only remained for the clergy to remind the slave's more fortunate brother of his "indifferentism and turning of the heart from God," and to threaten him with hell fire, brimstone and everlasting punishment in the world to come, if he refused to accept his monstrous theology. For clinging to theological dogmas of the dark ages, the Christianity of the United States was 3,000 years behind the Judaism of Moses, which denounced man-stealing. It is shameful, but it is a fact, that only yesterday in the great republic the Declaration of Independence was treason and the Golden Rule was heresy. We have the same thing to-day.

Take the effort to broaden the sphere of women. Only fifty years ago in the land of Jefferson woman was shut up in Eastern seclusion. If she belonged to the wealthy class, she was imprisoned in a gilded cage, like a pet canary. She was a piece of animated bric-a-brac. She had privileges but no rights. She was given compliments instead of justice. If she belonged to the poorer class, she was the drudge of the household. Whether rich or poor, she was guilty of her sex. As wife, she was merged in her husband. As mother, she had no claim upon her offspring. As daughter, she was dwarfed by her brother. As woman, she was ranked with "children and idiots." Her sex excluded her from every bread-winning avocation save the needle and teaching. As all female bread-winners were crowded into these two callings there was not work enough for all and the only alternative, too often, was to choose between starvation and a life of shame. All this has been changed, but not by the theological churchianity. The era of women has dawned, bearing the unmistakable prophecy of a higher civilization than humanity has ever known. Woman's sphere has been broadened to include everything God made her able to do—is about co-extensive with man's. She is to-day foremost in the great philanthropic, humanitarian, social and ethical reforms, in which selfishness has no place. In her widening influence, growing liberality, and freedom, we see imperiled a prophecy of an altruistic era—a civilization triumphant—rising against to-morrow's purple dawn. Meanwhile the old-time theology has been the opposer of every single forward step. It has flung Paul in the face of women precisely as it threw Onesimus in the face of the slave.

LABOR AND THE CHURCH.

Take the labor movement—the movement of the masses against the classes—the movement of the toilers to rescue from the clutches of work and wealth, shorter hours and a share in the profits. This movement the world over is the latest and greatest of miracles. From Russia to the United States labor is marshalling its forces to-day for the purpose of controlling to-morrow. Everywhere we see the tyranny of capital driving the toilers nearer the great ocean of want. In every great city richly jewelled with magnificent temples dedicated to deity, we find thousands of homeless people crying for bread and work. We see under the very shadow of the temples a poverty as appalling, as hopeless, as degrading as exists in any civilized country on earth. It has come to pass that those who produce food are hungry; those who build palaces are homeless; those who make clothing are naked. In this ceaseless struggle for existence, capital is more sacred than human rights; life less sacred than property. In despair these wretched men are crossing the Rubicon. Already there are occasional riots and bloodshed—feverish invitations to bloody revolution. The church takes no interest in these matters. It stands alienated from the wage-earner. It is unacquainted with his struggles, trials and degradation. It takes no interest in these things; knows nothing of the injustice and bitterness of the toiler's lot. But, says one, the church has no concern with social and industrial questions; its concern is spiritual! What, then, in the name of common sense, is the church for? What conceivable mission has it in the world, if it should not advocate the suppression of national wrongs which stand directly athwart its path to success in the work of evangelization? Christ's mission was "to seek and to save those who were lost, to preach the Gospel to the poor, to heal the broken hearted, to preach liberty to the captives, and opening the prison to them that are bound, and to comfort all that mourn." The church of the present day is not popular in sympathies, tendencies and methods. It gravitates away from the masses toward wealth, culture and clothes. The Gospel of Jesus Christ, like the Declaration of Independence, is antiquated and obsolete. Divine love is at a discount when it comes to aid the friendless, the forsaken, the despondent, the lost. The preachers are too busy bombarding the Pharisees of old to train their guns on the Pharisees of the twentieth century. They ascribe all the woes of mankind to the machinations of the devil and the mysterious plans of an inscrutable Providence. They only say: "Bless us! what a noise those fellows in their shirt sleeves are making out there. Let us sing the Doxology!" If the minister is reminded that his attitude is foreign to the mission of Jesus; that the Almighty himself instituted the first great labor movement on the banks of the Red Sea; that the burning bush should still be the church's inspiration to wage war against oppression and Egyptian bondage, he whispers: "Sh! Capital rents the pews, pays for the music and patronizes the parson. We will open a mission chapel on a side street and name it St. Lazarus." This done, he continues to magnify the importance of form, rite and ritual, while industry begs in vain for justice, employment and living wages. Dr. Channing says: "It is time that our lips should be closed if we can do nothing towards breathing into men the peculiar benevolence of the Gospel—a benevolence which feels for, and seeks to elevate and save, the human soul. It is time, too, that as a class of Christians we should disappear, if we will not take our part in the great work of regenerating society. It is the order of Nature, that the dead should be buried and the sooner a dead, lifeless, soulless sect is buried and forgotten the better." To-day the unchurched millions charged with "indifferentism," etc., are the glad attendants at the funeral. Meanwhile, the church is as ignorant of the impending cataclysm, and its own fate, as Versailles was of the French revolution a year before it reddened the streets of Paris with blood.

THE CHURCH AND THE PEOPLE.

Why add more? Will not this suffice to show the attitude of theological Christianity past and present? Viewed as a whole, is it any wonder there is drifting apart of the church and the people? The church has largely lost touch with the world. It is more institutional than personal. It builds cathedrals, not men. It has the sword of the spirit, but it is glued in the scabbard. It meets on Sunday for worship in splendid exclusion and seclusion and shuts the building through the week, while the congregation is occupied at the theatre, in the ball-room or on Wall street. The pulpit, warned off from living issues, drones through a parrot-like repetition of the creed—and the more sounding the ritual the less fervent the piety—and puts the emphasis on belief when it should be on conduct. Then, too, the church is preempted (and emptied) by wealth and fashion. Lawyers who are counsel for trusts and monopolies; capitalists whose names are associated with tricky monetary transastions; leaders of the ton whose real god is society; men and women prominent at church, in its officership, among its society leaders, who are at a discount as to honesty and reliability in the world, occupy the highest seat in the synagogue, and love to come because they feel sure that they will not be reminded of time in the contemplation of eternity. Meanwhile the industrial classes are conspicuous by their absence. There is an almost complete alienation from institutional religion on their part, those who were foremost in planting Christianity—in the apostleship, among its most devoted adherents, its chiefest beneficiaries, its saintliest exponents, its most eager martyrs—are now embittered and critical. They do not, they cannot, recognize Christianity and theological churchianity. They need religion as much as ever. The gracious words and beautiful example of Christ would be as potent to them in the twentieth century as they were in the first, were they as faithfully and lovingly presented. But the church of show, the church of the holy cash, the congregation of cast, the congregation of St. Sinner, a-la-mode, are an abomination to their souls. There is still another class of broad-minded, liberal thinkers who believe it is in vain that dogmatic stupidity, moral indolence and official hypocrisy try to confine the human and universal religion of the kingdom of God within the terms of the religion of theology, pietism, ecclesiasticism, and the interests which monopoly have vested in religion.

Yes, institutional religion is on the decline. The reverence for obsolete man-made creeds, ecclesiastical dogmas, and theological vagaries, is on the decline. The older growths of earlier Biblical interpretation have dropped, withered and are perishing. Men will not read forever in the worn paths of their ancestors. They will not become the satellites of men who are in their tombs. Theological Christianity would leave us among the crude environments of ancient history—in our swaddling clothes. To-day there are millions of minds reposing in the stagnant peace of an inflexible dogma—a faith cut, dried and infallible. But most people are beginning to believe man was created to a higher destiny. Orthodoxy is slavish adherence to that which has been. It must now be defined as old, regular, dull, unprogressive. The reason is plain. The people are intelligent. They are losing confidence in the miracles and marvels of the dark ages. They know the value of education and free thought. They appreciate the benefits of science—the outspoken enemy of ignorance and superstition. They are not interested in a religion that has nothing to offer them but magnificent ceremonies, show and sham. They are tired of a religion that does not touch the conduct and duties of daily life; that does not stand for justice and universal liberty. And the church never will fill its pews by lazily opening its doors once a week, clanging the bell in a ding-dong fashion, and saying: "You people out there come in here and be saved." If sinners ran their business like saints run the church, they would go into bankruptcy in a year. Imagine Paul standing in a gorgeous pulpit, with a $10,000 salary, and a $5,000 choir, in a church where pew rent is as high as house rent, with two or three seats down by the door for the use of the poor, and attributing the absence of the people to total depravity, to "mere indifference and wandering of the heart from God; to the unexampled activity of the mind in other directions," or a "science-crazy" world.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

SPIRIT LIFE NOW.

A Letter From Spirit Frances E. Willard.

Dear Brothers and Sisters:—Once more I come to greet you through the aid of this friendly paper, which is in deed and truth a "Progressive Thinker." I am well pleased with the development of Home Circles in our States. I know of several mediums, many of them quite young, who will be ready to step forward and hold up the standard of Spiritualism in earth life as its veteran mediums pass on, one by one, into the higher life.

In answer to many questioners I will say that mediums are born, not made. No one can become a medium for any particular phase unless he or she possesses the necessary physical, mental and spiritual qualities appertaining to that particular phase; that the possession of these qualities is the result of hereditary and of prenatal conditions. Its development therefore must be a growth, and it is best developed in the harmonious home circle.

The medium should "pursue a line of study and reading that will tend to develop the intellect and produce the habit of exalted thinking, engendering unselfish views and the perception of the fact that the true motives of life are expressed in altruism. Because by so doing we attract to ourselves spirits of like character and thereby come in closer touch with those who dwell in the more advanced spheres of spiritual existence, and the messages conveyed from them through our instrumentality will benefit the race."

Temperate and regular habits of living are essential to the progress of developing psychic powers. Be temperate in all things. Over-eating, giving way to anger, excitement or worry, retard the development of mediumship. Ascertain as soon as possible what phase of mediumship you are best adapted for. Sit steadily for the purpose of developing such phase. Exercise your own will force, and ask for the assistance of your spirit friends to accomplish your purpose, and patiently persevere until you have reached success.

If you patiently persevere and are actuated by an earnest desire to benefit humanity, you will soon attract to you spirit intelligences who will assist and guide you in your development, the details of which are largely of an individual nature, subject to the variations of circumstances and environment.

It has come to my knowledge that several mediums claim to have my exclusive control. To such I will say: Dear mediums, you are mistaken. My active nature delights in seeking mediums through whom I can express myself to humanity and assure it that I am alive and at work. A very ordinary individual in earth life with the aid of rapid transit, etc., can address several audiences in one and the same evening. And enlarging upon that idea, it is quite possible for an active spirit who can go from place to place with lightning rapidity, to make their presence known in several places almost simultaneously. And certainly I, who have learned the law of spirit manifestation and practice it continually, would not restrict my efforts and confine them to one medium who by the very nature of things could not fully express me as I wish to be expressed. Now, for instance, this medium to whom I am suggesting that she write these thoughts for me, cannot sing, and I who love music, and love to sing, cannot express myself in song through her instrumentality as well as I can through one whose vocal organs have been trained and cultivated. Therefore I seek another medium through whom I can sing my little song and pour out my soul in harmonious waves of music in an acceptable manner to my human audience in this manifestation. I am assisted, or rather am an assistant to my beloved sister Mary.

Now if this meets the eye of my dear musical medium, will she please step forward out of her obscurity and meet me half way, and let us appear in public and give our musical messages for the waiting ones—oh, so sadly waiting for the message of love from those gone before. Come forward, my little medium, overcome your timidity and let us deliver our message as Good Inspiries us. Then again there are speakers and lecturers that I fain would inspire, and pass on the inspiration my inspirers give me. So say no more about restricting the efforts of the spirit. I for one am free, will be free, and am in Spiritualism to work.

Yours lovingly,

FRANCES E. WILLARD.

THE SERPENT'S TRAIL.

Some Evils That Afflict Humanity.

Passing over our fair land in many ways, is a path well beaten down by sin. Truly it has well been likened to a serpent, for what glides along so noiselessly as sin? Once in a while some degree of it will, like the serpent, give warning, and wise are they that give heed to it.

I am minded to-day of the sin of intemperance, that great evil that is luring so many to darkness. I do not mean to darkness just for earth life, but it is a darkness that will envelope them for many long years after their spirits have been born into the spiritual world.

I wish one could make the result of such a wilful neglect of life and its opportunities so plain that all could see, and seeing, understand!

All things that tend to destroy the finer senses are degrading, both to the earthly and spiritual man. To be successful in occult studies one must be clean in heart and mind. "Like attracts like," is a true saying, and a person addicted to sin in any form will draw like people or spirits to him, giving him no chance, and ofttimes destroying his desire to launch out into the wide ocean of knowledge that is only a step beyond this life.

A wasted life appeals to me very forcibly, for how short earth life is, and how long eternity!

Again, there comes before me the sin of avarice—this desire and greed for gold, to obtain it, no matter how gotten. Could a person whose whole life is devoted to simply amassing gold, but see the sad plight those people are in when they bid farewell to their millions on earth, ere the sun of another day was hidden from view, they would begin to invest in deeds of charity in the land beyond the stars.

Gold is likened to sand in the spiritual world. A miser will have his gold, in sacks they pile it about him. Of what use is it? He cannot give it away. No thieves ever steal spiritual gold. So imagine a rich man's plight. Gold is good to do good with. That is all.

We see, too, the trail of the serpent in this desire to defraud, and pretend to be what we are not. And it seems to me in our religion—and to me Spiritualism is a religion—there is more chance to deceive, and pretend, than in any other. This is not building for truth, and righteousness, as our people should do. How easy it always is, to do good work when all join hands and work with a will. With one accord a few true people can do much.

The light that guided the children of Israel in their long sojourn in the wilderness has not dimmed in the least, but ofttimes we hold a shield between it and our eyes, fearful that we may see, and seeing, have to spread abroad the good news. When I think of the many things there are, to lure and deceive, I feel we cannot work hard, nor fast enough for the little time we are traveling to our home beyond.

And about the only remedy I see is the education of our boys and girls. Let us have the children until they are twelve years of age, and we may safely say "they are ours." We cannot sit idly by and say: "I can do so little. I will do nothing." In this life of constant warfare between good and evil, no one can be neutral. Our influence goes abroad, no matter where we may be, for one or the other.

I beg of you, oh, students of the higher life, let us strive to eradicate, in some degree, this fearful trail of the serpent of sin! Let us not go into the spiritual world and find we have lived only a butterfly life. We are given our lives and our talents, few though they may be, for a purpose, and the failure to use them for good will surely keep our thoughts earthward, when we are bidden to go hence. Once more, let me say, let us all strive, as one, to help humanity and blot out the path that surely leads to darkness.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

You should sign your own name and address to the items you send in; otherwise they may be cast into the waste basket.

A. C. Austin writes from Hudson, S. D.: "I have taken your paper for a year and a half, and find many interesting articles in it. From personal experience with hypnotic subjects and several sittings with mediums, I believe that this phenomena is not produced by disembodied spirits. Barring these 'dreamland' articles, your paper is very interesting."

Virginie Barrett writes: "I desire to state that I will be ready in September to resume my labors for the cause of Spiritualism and temperance. Anyone desiring my services can address me at 1915 Broadway, Indianapolis, Ind. Will Mrs. Hayden, of this city, kindly send me her address?"

The Spiritualists at Chesterfield made a grand mistake in not re-electing Mr. Hilligoss as president. Some time ago Dr. Hilligoss married a wealthy Cincinnati woman, who, so the story goes, wanted her husband honored again, and to reward them she intended presenting them with a check for their entire indebtedness. Her husband was ignominiously defeated and Mrs. Hilligoss has not offered a cent. The Spiritualists are now wondering about their election.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

The late Prof. Schenk, of Vienna, Austria, whose theories about determining the sex of children in advance attracted a great deal of attention some years ago, left manuscripts, it is said, in which he developed his original theory to the most extreme extent. According to these documents, Prof. Schenk claimed that through his system the parents of children could produce any characteristics they desired in their offspring. They could be artists, athletes, musicians, philanthropists, or criminals just as the parents wished.

J. S. Roberts writes as follows of his experience while sitting in a circle with a trance medium who was controlled by Spirit Sambo, a colored man: "I paid but little attention to his gabble, but presently I heard another voice which caused me to look up and pay strict attention. That voice said to me: 'Papa, don't grieve for me. I am happy here, and I want to progress, and if you weep for me it keeps me from progressing.' I did what she asked me to do, because I knew it was my wife's voice, and was satisfied that it was her. My old father afterwards came to me and said that he had been looking for that hell that the preachers of the Baptist church and others talked about, but he had never been able to find it."

The re-election of President Peck of St. Louis, will be learned with satisfaction by the members of the association, in all parts of the country. Mr. Peck has been identified with the M. V. S. A. since the second year of its organization and to him is due much of the success of the association. Mr. Peck's lectures also have won for him widespread fame. Under his management the affairs of the Spiritualists will no doubt continue to prosper. The many friends of Mrs. Emma B. Knowles of this city were pleased at her re-election to the office of vice-president, which office she held last year. Mrs. Mollie B. Anderson, the newly-elected secretary, has been a member of the Women's Union for some years, and with the treasurer, Mrs. Cooper, will no doubt prove an able and efficient officer. The latter was re-elected. A vote of thanks was given to the retiring secretary, Mrs. Stella A. Fisk, and former treasurer, Hiram Eddy, for the faithful performance of duties.—Clinton (Ia.) Herald.

Mrs. Arthur Zumstein writes: "The book, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands, has been received. I have read it, and I wish everybody could read it. I now have eight of the premium books. I am proud of them. The Progressive Thinker has given me pleasure, and is a home comfort. I consider it one of my best friends."

In all probability the camp-ground of the Spiritualists at Chesterfield will be greatly enlarged by the time the association meets again next year. In addition to extending the grounds, it is said that there will be a number of cottages erected by the Spiritualists who will rent them out. It has been learned this season by the Spiritualists that the present capacity of the camp grounds is not sufficient and that their stock of cottages is so small that they cannot provide accommodations to those eager to secure cottages on the grounds. There will be other improvements made but what they will consist of has not been given out. This season the association announces that they have made a success at this year's camp, and that their treasury has been greatly enlarged. The information as to the erecting of several new cottages has been given out and it is said to be confirmed by other Spiritualists.—Muncie (Ind.) Herald.

R. Cowell writes from Oakland, Cal.: "For the past six months Mrs. R. Cowell has been lecturing and giving tests to very large audiences at Loring Hall, 11th street, this city, but is now filling an engagement at the Los Angeles camp-meeting, which will terminate September 17. After taking a much-needed rest for a few weeks she will, on her return, re-open Loring Hall, commencing October 5, when she will give her experience of a Southern California camp-meeting, and hopes to have the pleasure of meeting all of her old friends. There is no admission fee and all are Welcome."

The Tribune speaks as follows of a dream: "Awakened by a dream that some mishap had befallen his wife, Bryant Schick, 2057 South Forty-second avenue, detected the odor of escaping gas. Hastening to the room occupied by his wife and two children Schick found the door locked. He forced it open and saw wife and children lying on the bed unconscious. Gas was escaping from an open jet and the window was closed. When Dr. Lloyd arrived five minutes later, he found the husband kneeling at the bedside crying to his wife to speak to him. Dr. Lloyd, after making an examination of the woman and her two children, declared that they had been dead nearly two hours."

Henry Brunhaus writes from No. 27 Eleventh street, Wheeling, W. Va.: "We have a good opening here for a first-class lecturer and test medium, either gentleman or lady who comes well endorsed. We as a society will pledge ourselves to pay the sum of twenty-five dollars per month from October 1, 1902, to June, 1903, providing the party gives us satisfaction. This is a great field and a good test medium (especially one who could give satisfactory private readings) could work under the auspices of our society, and in our opinion make an excellent living here. Address me for particulars."

The Times-Republican, of Marshalltown, Iowa, says: "The ninth annual camp-meeting of the Central Iowa Spiritualists' Association began Sunday afternoon in the old Hughes grove, on North Third street, and will continue until September 14. There was a fair-sized crowd present at the opening service, which was conducted at 2:30 by Rev. Harry J. Moore, of Chicago, who spoke on 'Jesus as a Man, Medium and Savior.' Rev. Moore held the closest attention of his audience from the time he began until he concluded. He is a very able speaker, logical, convincing and eloquent, and treated his subject as if he were perfectly familiar with all the phases of Spiritualism. He is considered by members of the association to be by far the strongest man ever secured for the annual gatherings.

At 4 o'clock Mrs. Maggie Waite held a test seance. Mrs. Waite demonstrated, gave her audience many surprises and to a large number, short readings. In the evening Rev. Moore again addressed the meeting, his subject being 'Various Modes of Baptism.' The subject did not give Mr. Moore as good a chance to display his powers, but it proved very interesting. A unique feature of the evening was the receiving of several spirit messages during the discourse, which were used to illustrate several points. The lecture was followed by a christening service, at which three small children, William Messenger, son of Mrs. Jennie Messenger; Lillian Russell and the three-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Awde were christened. The service was very beautiful, flowers being used instead of water. If all of the association's talent proves to be as good as Rev. Moore and Mrs. Waite, there is no doubt but that the meeting will be a very successful one."

Samuel H. Davis writes from Courtenay, B. C.: 'I want to tell your readers about my library that I started August 6, 1900. I have the three volumes of the Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World, the Occult Life of Christ, the Hull-Covert Debate, the Discovered Country, by Carlyle Petersilea, Mary Anne Carew, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands, Philip Carlisle, the Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism, Father Tom and the Pope, Mediumship and Its Laws, by Hudson Tuttle, and the late premium book, Religion of Man and Ethics of Science. So you see, Mr. Editor, that I have started quite a library. I have my eye on some other books. I wish that some good medium or lecturer would come to this part of the world and start the good work. Address me for particulars."

Lorentz Nilsson, of Jersey City, who was employed by the late Luther R. Marsh to make flashlight photographs of spirit visitors from the other world, spirit communications and spirit paintings, has written an account of certain happenings in the Marsh household at Middletown, N. Y. He says among other things: "I was first employed by Mr. Marsh to make flashlight pictures of spirits produced by Prof. Archer, who was at that time giving seances for Mr. Marsh and his friends. The first night I took the pictures I was stationed in front of some lace curtains opposite an opening where the supposed spirits were to appear. The spirits that appeared included those of Rameses I, Rameses II, Moses, Joseph and several others. The illusion was perfect and greatly startled me, but later when developing the negatives I noticed that the beards of some of the spirits had been carelessly adjusted. I photographed all of the Dis De Bar paintings for Mr. Marsh. One of the paintings I photographed, which is now in the gallery in the Huyler house, was particularly prized by Mr. Marsh. It is a piece of canvas burned almost to the edges of its handsome frame. The manner of its burning illustrates the arts employed to delude Mr. Marsh. At a seance he had suddenly demanded a painting. The demand took the medium and her assistants by surprise. A quick-witted man in the gathering began to swear in a loud voice. This distracted the attention of all hands for a moment or two and an assistant quickly applied some phosphorus to a near-by painting. The picture began to burn, and the medium announced that it was a rebuke from the spirit world for the blasphemy."—Lancaster (Pa.) Examiner.

G. F. Lewis writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "Hon. A. Gaston, who has brought the great Spiritualist camp to its high religious status, has resigned. Mr. Skidmore, who has also done what he could, has also resigned. Mrs. C. P. Pettengill, of Cleveland, whom we have known when her husband was living, is now in charge. We had known her before she was a Spiritualist. She has always been a worker on the side of right and always worked well, single or double. Under her management greater things will be done. They held a love feast as earnest and truly loving as the spiritual love feasts of the Methodists before they became worldly."

Virginie Barrett writes: "Before me is a letter from Mrs. M. T. Allen, of Missouri. She predicts the passing to spirit life within six months of an important worker in our ranks, a man prominent in the field, who will be greatly missed because of his efficient and needed work for the cause."

Mrs. L. A. Hutchins, of Bethel, Vt., writes: "I am over eighty-five years old, but just as much interested in Spiritualism as I have ever been, which is saying considerable. Last spring I came with my daughter to this town and engaged rooms for the summer. We at once began looking for some Spiritualists and succeeded in finding a half-dozen or so who were more or less in sympathy with us. We then began holding circles every Thursday evening. After a few weeks Mrs. Ida Lewis, of this town, who is well known to many of the readers of The Progressive Thinker, but who was ill for some time after our arrival, came to us and has met with us every week since. She is doing a good work under the guidance of Francis E. Willard and others. The influence has at all times been helpful and uplifting, and a spirit of genuine kindness has been very noticeable. The circles have steadily increased in numbers and interest until we can scarcely find room for those who wish to attend. We came to this place by the advice of spirit friends, and we feel much satisfied with our efforts to promote the cause of truth."

J. M. Pierce writes from South St. Louis, Mo.: "Carondelt Spiritualist Association was organized July 22, at the house of Mrs. J. M. Pierce, 8302 Van Buren street, with 18 members. We went into our new hall Sunday, Aug. 24; it was decorated with flowers. Each one was given a bouquet of flowers tied with purple ribbon. There were 75 people in the hall, and when we left there were 57 names on the roll book. Mrs. R. Detloff, test medium; J. F. Jordan, lecturer; J. M. Pierce, secretary."

A library for the purpose of giving free access to Spiritualistic literature and of introducing its members to Spiritualistic circles, so that circles may be formed in private houses and special seances with mediums imported from Boston, has been established by the devotees of Spiritualism in Montreal, at 2309 St. Catherine street. Major G. M. Bellasis, late of the Bengal Staff Corps, is librarian. The arrangements for circles and special seances depends upon the number of names sent in within next month. The library and reading room will be open to visitors from 12 to 3 o'clock and from 8 to 9:30 each day. It contains the leading papers of the cult and volumes bearing upon the phenomena of Spiritualism.—Herald, Montreal, Canada.

Mrs. M. A. Merrell writes: "I want to say that I highly appreciate your paper, and drink in the great and beautiful truths contained therein."

Harry J. Moore goes this week to Columbus, Ohio.

Mrs. Anna Annabil, Spiritualistic medium and clairvoyant, last night gave her usual Sunday evening seance with an attendance of a small company of men and women. Through Mrs. Annabil in a trance condition, the audience, as she claimed, was addressed by the spirit of an editor of an Indianapolis newspaper on "How the Principles of Spiritualism Harmonize with the Principles of Socialism." While the spirit editor did not closely confine himself to his subject he made a few pungent statements. For instance, he suggested that before women vote they should educate themselves in all those political principles essential to a complete knowledge of how to vote for the best interests of the community. All platforms contained something good, but it was urged a political platform was never written that did not contain something "not so good." The control said we had come to believe the Republicans were for Republicans; Democrats for Democrats and the devil for all. Parties and party platforms change, but principles, never. The socialist, as was urged, is imbued by advanced ideas of the most good to the most people and the ex-editor said if he could again come to earth he should probably ally himself with that party if for no other reason than that it was fighting for government ownership of public utilities.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

William E. Curtis, the journalist, writing from Atlantic City, N. J., to the Chicago Herald, says: "A French clairvoyant yesterday told me my name, my age, my residence and my occupation correctly for 25 cents, and it was money well spent to obtain such valuable information in that way. At his request I first wrote them down on a slip of paper, which I folded twice and sealed in an envelope. He held one end of the envelope and I held the other, while he placed his other hand upon my head. I was told to think hard of what I had written and he would read my thoughts. He did so, gave every point correctly, and offered to answer any further questions I might ask him, and go into a trance for a dollar. If I was interested in the stock market, he said, he could give me some very valuable information, and I've no doubt he could. It is a smart man who can tell you what is concealed in an envelope.

Geo. W. Walrond writes from San Francisco, Cal.: "Spiritualism is making good headway on the Coast. Mrs. Ada Foye stands pre-eminent here as the drawing card; her meetings are crowded, and her spiritual tests everything to be desired. John Slater is doing well and maintains an old established reputation."

J. F. Gordan writes from Carondelet, Mo.: "In this vicinity last Sunday, a new society was formed."

T. W. Prichard writes from 715 Carson street, Pittsburg, Pa.: "Camp closed on August 24, and we will open at No. 27 Lacock street, Allegheny City, on August 27. We have Mrs. M. Prichard, of Milwaukee, Wis., with us for a few weeks. She is stopping at 715 Carson street, South Side. Other meetings will start to hold forth about the first of September."

Captain Geo. W. Walrond, astrologer, of Denver, Colo., arrived at San Francisco, Cal., early in August where at the Manhattan Hotel, he was again stricken with a third attack of nervous and physical prostration, so severe that he had to be ambulanced to the "Taylor Sanatorium," where for several days his life hung in the balance. The great watchfulness and care of Dr. F. H. Osman and the nurse, Miss Nana Sullivan, alone pulled him through an almost fatal termination to existence. We are glad to learn that Mr. Walrond is on the road to recovery and will return to Denver, Colo., after visiting his Spiritualistic friends in Los Angeles and San Diego, Cal., and Portland, Oregon, from whence he will visit Seattle and Spokane, Wash. He writes us that he will resume work in Denver on Wednesday, October 1, as usual with Spiritualistic meetings every Sunday and Wednesday evening. All correspondence will be attended to if addressed to Captain Geo. W. Walrond, Denver, Colo.

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

On account of Labor Day we are compelled to go to press earlier than usual, and in consequence many items have been crowded out.

The friends of Esther Gideon Thomas will please take notice that her correct address is 2226 Second avenue, Seattle, Washington, and also that classes by correspondence will be commenced October 1. All interested can make definite arrangements during September.

Frank Talton writes from the Ashley Camp-meeting, Ohio: "There has been a large attendance the first two weeks of this camp. Mrs. A. E. Kibby and Frank T. Ripley have given the best of satisfaction. Next Sunday we have Brother E. W. Sprague and wife, and Frank T. Ripley, who will remain until the close of camp, then Mr. Ripley goes to Springfield, Mo., for all of September and October.

It appears from the Harbinger of Light that Mrs. Helen Temple Brigham arrived at Sydney on the evening of Friday, July 4, too late for the Melbourne express, and being detained in that city over Sunday, gave two lectures there for the Psychic Society. On account of the brief notice given the afternoon one was sparsely attended, but the news getting abroad, there was a full house at the evening meeting. She arrived in Melbourne on the following Tuesday, and on Sunday, July 13, made her first public appearance at the Masonic Hall, Collins street, her opening (afternoon) lecture being on "The Religion of Spiritualism," wherein she showed that Spiritualism was not a new cult, but a religion built upon records of spiritual intercourse and manifestations in past ages, and the overwhelming testimonies of the present era of the intimate relation existing between the natural and the spiritual worlds or conditions. In the evening her subject, "Death and the Beyond," attracted a large audience. In it she affirmed that man, being a spirit now clothed in mortal garb, did not die, but merely threw off his mortal garment and entered into a higher state of being, retaining his loves, sympathies, and general characteristics.

Grand Ledge Camp, Mich.

Grand Ledge Spiritual Camp Association has just closed a very successful camp session, Mrs. Abbie E. Sheets presiding in a very able manner, and it was regretted very much that she was not to able to be present all of the time.

Mrs. Loe F. Prior was the first speaker; her lectures were fine and her messages good, giving comfort to many. She stayed up to and including Friday, August 1. Her daughter, Leola Prior, a promising young elocutionist, was with her, and gave a very interesting entertainment, ably assisted by Minnie Reid Marvin, the musical director of the camp.

Saturday, August 2, Geo. H. Brooks came, and in his jovial way entertained all. His lectures and psychometric readings were very good. During the week he was there, one evening the campers had an old-fashioned spelling-school, and another evening an old folks' concert, in both of which he took a very active part.

Geo. W. Kates and Zaida Brown Kates occupied the time from August 9 until August 14, and gave very good satisfaction. Friday, August 14, H. L. Chapman, of Marcellus, gave a very able address, followed by messages by Mrs. Kates; after which Mr. Chapman gave some beautiful poems from subjects taken from the audience, which were highly complimented.

Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague occupied the platform from August 16 to August 22, and their work was well received and highly appreciated by all who heard them.

August 23 was the day Dr. E. E. Parker was to fill, he having been called to the higher life, by the unanimous request of the campers, Mrs. Abbie E. Sheets was prevailed upon to give the lecture; it was one of the most able addresses that we had the pleasure to listen to during the camp.

Sunday, August 24, the last day, Mrs. Martha E. Root addressed the large audiences, both morning and afternoon. Her address was eloquent, and in honor of the fact that Mrs. Root is a very prominent worker in the woman's suffrage movement, the platform was decorated with yellow flowers, and nearly every person was presented with a yellow button-hole bouquet.

Saturday, the 23rd, the business meeting was held at 10:30 a. m. The reports of the officers show the association to be in good working condition. The election of officers resulted in the election of Messrs. Ewing and Campbell for four years, and Dr. B. O'Dell for two years.

There is one thing more that needs more than a passing notice, and that is the effective work of Minnie Reid Marvin, the musical director. The manner in which she conducted the music and the leading part she took in all the entertainments and the general manner in which she worked to entertain the campers and make every one have a good time, met with full approval.

William Devine, the general manager, was ever ready to do all that he could to make it pleasant and agreeable for all, which only shows that he is the right man in the right place. The prospects for the camp the coming season are more encouraging than ever.

ONE OF THE CAMPERS.

German Day at Lake brady.

August 17 was German Day at Lake Brady, Ohio, for the second time of the First German Spiritualist Society of Cleveland, Ohio.

The day was an ideal one, perfect in every way, and with nature's surroundings, beautiful music and good cheer, which is ever present among true Spiritualists—so strongly shown here on that day, and which gladden the hearts and souls of the many present.

Our train, bearing about 400 from Cleveland, mostly Germans, was delayed about an hour by passing excursion trains going to Cleveland. This interfered with the morning programme, which had to be cut short, making it after 11 o'clock before we reached camp. The opening address by the president, C. F. Hunger, was in English, (for there were many more Americans than Germans.) The first address by Miss Heinsohn was short but strong, assuring all of the life to come, and given in scholarly German. The tests by W. H. French, Edith Buchwald, and Mrs. A. E. Moore were excellent. The music by Prof. W. Graban, on the zither, Miss Graban, mandolin, and Mr. Ruger, guitar, was beautifully rendered.

At lunch every one was jolly with good cheer, so that by the time of the afternoon services every one was eager for all the good intellectual food that might come. The tent was filled to overflowing, many sitting and standing outside, including many strangers.

The German lecture, read from manuscript, was excellent, and well rendered, the title being translated, "What We want."

The next was an inspired lecture in German, which was forcibly rendered, assuring the hearers that spirit return was a fact.

The last lecture was by Mr. J. E. Pope, in English. He began with the tiny raps of Modern Spiritualism at Hydesville, and came up to the present time, showing briefly but clearly its import on all the great events of the last fifty years. Nearly all the orthodox ministers were knowingly and unknowingly preaching Spiritualism, mentioning several of St. Louis, Chicago, New York and other places where these eminent divines were saying there was no heaven, no hell, no future place of fire and brimstone, but that these places were conditions brought on by each individual; also that there was no personal God, but that each one was a part of that great intelligence called spirit, and many other such up-to-date truths, showing clearly the growth of the spirit of Spiritualism. These sentences of Mr. Pope were beautifully given.

Mr. Pope is a reader and student of the higher class. His lecture gave everyone something to take home and think about.

The tests as in the morning session, were all recognized and gladly received.

It was a most enjoyable day, filling the soul with good things to take home, and long to be remembered.

The best minds all over the globe are taking hold of this great question, and while none can clearly answer for and demonstrate the return of spirits to others, it has simply resolved itself into this, that every one who begins its study must simply grow into it. You cannot lift the cover and see it any more than get knowledge with a spoon. You must grow up into true Spiritualism. It will unfold as you study and live it. The more you study and live this beautiful philosophy, the clearer it becomes. This is my answer to those seeking real spiritual truth.

Lily Dale Camp.

Yesterday, Sunday, closed the meetings at Lily Dale for 1902. The day was pleasant and the attendance large. Mr. Grimshaw and Mr. Colville were the speakers, each in his own way presenting the truth of Spiritualism as it is presented to him.

The closing week was full of value to all at the camp. Prof. Lockwood continued the class lectures after Mr. Wright's departure, and each lecture seemed to elicit more and more praise and appreciation. May these two long continue their work of lifting the human mind out of the mire of ignorance and creedal superstitions, on to the broad table lands of facts and mental freedom.

Mr. Colville comes in with his idealism and makes strong arguments to sustain his position.

In this summing up we cannot mention all individually, but suffice, each one who has spoken from this rostrum this year has presented some truth along Spiritualistic lines which will bear fruit in all the years to come.

The mediums also have done a good work. Nearly all phases have been represented, and very little adverse criticism has been heard.

We hope the day is near at hand when the cry of fraud will be silenced forever, through the efforts of our mediums to make their work so plain that only truth will be seen; and also we hope the scales of suspicion will fall from the eyes of investigators, so they may know and see truth, instead of the shadow of their own thought. Let us have truth, and harmony and good-will will prevail.

Since the last election of trustees for the C. L. F. A. for 1903, in which President Gaston received an overwhelming majority of the votes of the stockholders, there has been a compromise of the opposing factions, through which Mr. Gaston sells his stock to the other party and places the control of the Association in their hands.

Mr. Gaston year after year has shown his power to stand at the head of this Association, and it is now only through ill health and a desire to lay down the burden, that he makes this amicable arrangement and places the controlling power in other hands.

There is no reason why, in the future, Lily Dale Camp should not be as successful and important a factor in human progress as it has been in the past, and it is our hope that the incoming management may fully realize all expectations.

MARY WEBB-BAKER.

Letter From Mr. and Mrs. Sprague

To the Editor:—Our work continues to prosper. During the month of July we held 29 meetings, officiated at one funeral, organized and chartered two new societies, reorganized one that had gone down, and visited four of our previously organized societies.

The work has been successful and much good has resulted therefrom. A small balance was left for the N. S. A. treasury after all expenses were paid.

We are now filling our camp-meeting engagements and will complete the last one for this season, September 7, at Ashley, Ohio. We are billed for Williamsport, Pa., September 12, 13 and 14, after that time we will fill engagements in the states of New York and Massachusetts, while working our way to Boston, where we will attend the N. S. A. convention.

Parties wishing our services as missionaries should write us at once, so we may arrange to serve them while on our way. Address us at No. 618 Newland avenue, Jamestown, N. Y.

FOREVER.

Two little streamlets leaped and flowed
And they sang their songs together;
They felt alike the summer rays
And bore the stormy weather;
The self-same blossoms decked them both
In colors rich and rare,
And in each stream the song birds wooed
Their bright reflections there.
And on and on and on they danced,
Each leaping toward the river,
And then they met to kiss and part
Forever and forever.

Two human lives, two kindred hearts,
By destiny's decree,
Met in the spring of life to learn
Its deepest mystery.
They dreamed their morning dreams of hope
Through fair, unclouded weather;
They opened love's bewitching book
And read it through together;
They saw in one another's eyes
A deep, unspoken bliss,
And from each other's lips they took
Love's ever ready kiss.

And then the fate that crushes all
The sweetest pleasures here
Turned hope's glad music to a sigh,
Its glory to a tear.
It stepped between them. Ah, it mocked
The love it could not kill!
It bade them in its fury live
And love and suffer still.
They tried with outstretched hands to span
Fate's wide, unyielding "Never,"
The voice of destiny replied,
"Forever and forever!"

HAY FEVER AND ASTHMA CURED BY THE Kola Plant.

The Kola Plant.

A New and Positive Cure for HAY-FEVER and ASTHMA has been found in the Kola Plant, a rare botanic product of West African origin. So great are the powers of this New Remedy that in the short time since its discovery it has come into almost universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America for the cure of every form of Hay-Fever and Asthma. Its cures are really marvelous. Men, women and children who have been given up as incurable are being restored daily to perfect health by the use of Himalya. Thousands of letters attesting its wonderful cures have been written the Importers, but limited space prevents a detailed list. Read what a few have to say, proving that Hay-Fever and Asthma can be cured:

Mr. J. B. Ayle, Estherville, Iowa, writes, Feb. 28th, 1902, that he was cured of Hay Fever and Asthma after severe suffering for 28 years. Miss Eva Preston, Petersburg, Ind., writes March 8th, 1902, that she suffered untold misery for 18 years with Hay Fever and Asthma. Is completely cured, although her physician said that a cure was impossible in her case. Wm. Kubler, Sr., Warrenton, Mo., writes Dec. 22nd, was cured of Hay-Fever and Asthma of five years standing, and that his son was also cured after many years of similar suffering. Mr. J. W. Cully, No. 1159 W. Lafayette Ave., Jacksonville, Ill., writes March 10th, 1902: "I traveled a great deal for relief from Asthma; climate of Michigan and Minnesota gave temporary relief, but Himalya entirely cured me." Rev. J. L. Coombs, Marlinsburg, W. Va., writes to the New York World, July 22nd, that it cured him of Asthma of 20 years' standing. Mrs. Emaline Bolton, No. 389 Canarroe St., Philadelphia, Pa., writes March 9th, 1902, was completely cured two years ago, and says Himalya is the only Asthma medicine that has merit, and she has tried them all. Mr. C. B. Slade, Los Angeles, Cal., writes March 8th, 1902, that Himalya saved his life. He told numbers of sufferers about his cure, and Himalya did not fail in a single case.

If you suffer from Hay-Fever and Asthma in any form, do not despair, but write at once to the Kola Importing Co., No. 1162 Broadway, New York City, N. Y., who in order to prove the power of this wonderful new botanic discovery will send you one Trial Case by mail, entirely Free. Remember it costs you absolutely nothing.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
—OR—
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the Formation of Circles and Cultivation of Mediumship

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

H. Brown: Q. (1) It is reported that Ethan Allen advised his daughter to hold to the faith of her mother, rather than his. Is there any evedence for or against this statement?

(2) Is is also claimed that Voltaire recanted. Is this true?

A. The most difficult thing to prove or disprove is a lie told of one who is dead and thus placed beyond the power to expose it. Ethan Allen was exceedingly eccentric, and he might have said to his daughter the words reported. It would not show that he weakened in his belief. But there is not the least trustworthy evidence that he faltered in his belief. He died suddenly from apaplexy, and could not have made any concessions at that momentous time, and it is not probable that he would do so at any other time.

(2) As for the great writer, Voltaire, the church which hated him even more bitterly than he hated the sham it sustained, had a little foundation for the lie it promulgated. He was not an atheist, but a pronounced deist. Religious rites sat easily on him and he said that "We must howl a little with the wolves. If I were on the banks of the Ganges I would die with a cow's tail in my hand." Hence he went through the, to him, empty form of confessing to a priest, that he might receive decent burial, which he could not without. His dying confession to his secretary was, "I die in the adoration of God, in love to my friends, without hatred of my enemies."

L. J. Smith: Q. (1) What is the difference and relation between socialism and anarchy?

(2) What is the greatest obstruction to the introduction of a better system of economy?

A. Socialism is defined by he Century Dictionary, the best authority, as "Any theory or system of social organization which would abolish entirely or in great part, the individual effort and competition on which modern society rests, and substitute for it co-operative effort, would introduce a more perfect and equal distribution of the products of labor, and would make land and capital as the instruments and means of production the joint possession of the members of the community."

The same authority defines as an anarchist "One who advocates anarchy or the absence of government as a practical ideal. In popular use, one who seeks to overturn by violence all constituted forms and institutions of society and government, all law and order and all rights of property, with no purpose of establishing any other system of order in the place of that destroyed."

It would appear to be impossible to confound beliefs so wide apart and antagonistic, and the true Socialist has not a purpose in common with the anarchist. Unfortunately there are those who call themselves Socialists who incline more or less to the idea and methods of the anarchists. They have a great variety of theories for the salvation of the people, the most of which if put in practice would bring about a state of confusion the equal of the anarchists' ideal.

While every Socialist believes in the co-operative efforts of the individuals, and ownership by the government of the primary elements of capital, there is great diversity in the method by which this great change shall be effected. Those who propose force are, perhaps unknowingly, advocating anarchy, to which force would quickly lead.

The Russian Nihilists are a conspicuous example of the blending of all shades of socialism and anarchy to the extreme of advocating and practicing a reign of terror, by the assassination of all rulers.

The best and only practical way to introduce a better social and economic system is by educating the people, the masses, up to its understanding and the feeling of its necessity. A few may clearly see the great advantages of a new order, but they will by its advocacy bring only failure unless they have a following which places them in the majority. The masses have to be pulled forward by education, not by laws. And more, this education must proceed along the lines of evolution, of slow and ever advancing growth. It must be remarked that most reformers attack the existing system with the antagonism which breeds revolution. As the tornado is sometimes necessary to restore the lost equilibrium, the conflict of revolution is required to blot out errors with the blood of self-sacrifice; yet if mankind had knowledge of the laws of national growth, these horrible antagonisms might be avoided.

At present we see labor and capital pitted against each other. Under the new conditions by which the forces of nature are made the slaves of capital, and labor excluded from its rightful share in this boundless source of wealth, the very foundation of the old system is broken up; there must be a new adjustment. It may be an evolution as peacefully and silently wrought as the fruitage of a plant after its maturity has been reached. This may be if the rights of all be secured; if justice be meted out to the humblest. If in reckless heedlessness of the portentous signs in the heavens; the muttering thunder of discontent, the murmur of despairing labor hopeless of having its just reward, capital continues to claim all but the doled wage, the time will swiftly come when the tension will be unbearable. The growth of the peaceful day has been wasted and its hour of storm brings retribution.

Oh, for statesmen, sensitive to the advice of angels, who could lead the nation to the highlands of exact and undiscriminating justice to all!

No system or laws can make men equal in ability, in intellect or morals. A system of government which carried its paternal care to the overseeing, directing and maintenance of the individual would be as opposed to his true interests as the present antagonism. True government is for the most perfect development of the individual by giving the opportunity, and the conditions best promotive of such development. For this it must hold the natural sources of wealth, the land with its mines, and commercial channels as a common, national heritage. Every individual owns a title deed, inalienable, recorded in his organization and the constitution of things, to as much air as he can breath, as much water as will supply his thirst, and as much land as will yield him support. Grant this—and is it not an axiom—a self-evident truth?—and the problem of the age is solved.

Spirit Materialization.

There are some Spiritualists who look askance at the materialization of spirits and give it a wide berth. Whatever grounds may have given rise to this prejudice, this phenomenon is nevertheless, the highest and most efficient mode of manifestation, and the least open to fraud or collusion if we except independent writing on closed slates or paper within a box securely locked. Even this is not so impressive and convincing as to see a well-known spirit friend stand in full view and write with rapidity far beyond mortal ability in a clear, legible hand, conversing in the meantime, with those present.

It is certainly more satisfactory and convincing to hear an orator standing plainly before his audience, than to hear his words uttered by another. Men have gone hundreds of miles to hear some celebrated orator; being charmed by the majesty of his presence and the melody of his voice. So it is with the materialized form of Webster, of Lincoln, of Beecher or Ingersoll and others.

There is no sense so impressive, so pleasing, so convincing, as that of sight. Then when our spirit friends stand before us in propria persona and we witness their well-known gestures and modes of speech, what in other manifestations is wanting is complete in this. Even in those we have not seen in mortal life, but whose portraits are familiar, the striking resemblance in the materialized form, makes an impression not made in any other manifestation, though we may be satisfied with the identity of the person communicating.

During the seances now being held in Spring Hill, we were favored by the presence of a young lady from Topeka, Kans.—Miss Mary E. Ruppright, a woman of intelligence, culture and refinement, who is developing as a materializing medium. The writer attended some of her developing seances under the tutorship and direction of W. W. Aber. Several forms appeared to me, announced their names and spoke my name.

Her development is progressing satisfactorily; and her mediumship promises great results. She is sincerely and earnestly devoted to the work, and is willing to give her life service to the cause of Spiritualism. We need many more materializing mediums to lay a strong and firm foundation upon which to build a solid and enduring structure for the enlightenment of mortals—a need more pressing than any other means for the moral and spiritual progress of mankind.

Many are disposed to value lightly the physical manifestations, and charge the fraudulent practices so much talked of, to them. This is greatly a mistaken notion. There can be no structure without a foundation. That foundation is facts. In this respect, we have the testimony of Prof. Denton in his saying: "My friends, before you came into this room we heard you discussing the phenomena and the rostrum. I want to say to you, my friends, phenomena are the only efficacious means of propaganda. When I was in the physical, I did much lecturing; and I do not now believe that I ever made one convert to Spiritualism by lecturing. I found my lecturing was mostly theory. People do not want theory. Such as would embrace Spiritualism want the truth."—"Rending the Vail, p. 361.)

Facts are the revelators of all truth. The fact of materialization is the most striking, the most convincing; and should be the most appreciated.

Let us give to Miss Ruppright our best wishes for her success, and the benefit of the encouragement that our highest and noblest thoughts may afford; that the cause may be advanced by her mediumship.

LILY DALE CAMP.

Class Lectures—Prosperity of the Camp—A New Deal.

The past two seasons, 1901 and 1902, have been noteworthy for this innovation. There have been classes galore at many camps, mostly individual enterprises, not of a representative character. Generally they have dealt in metaphysical assumptions, and speculative theories, more or less instructive, but chiefly valuable as incentives to discussion and variations of thought, and some of them wholesome stimulants to good morals. But the classes that have distinguished Lily Dale, have been of a different type. They have been under the auspices of the Cassaduga Lake Free Association, and by collections and contributions they have been made free to the general public, so that all who desired could share them. But the distinguishing feature of them has been the scientific basis and inductive methods of the teaching. The tendencies of the human mind are to dogmatize. A theory is started by a lively imagination, and facts are ignored, and soon a following of metaphysical fanatics establishes a cult on a basis of assumption chiefly, and the result is a chase after phantoms.

It is true that science has a phase of speculation, and some sort of theorizing is essential to all study of nature. But the theories of science are usually held tentatively, and not affirmed dogmatically. They are open to investigation, and subject to change, or a total abandonment, when facts are found to be against them. But dogmatism despises facts, and those who build on them are intolerant of contradiction, and spurn the experimentalist who squares his theory to the authority of facts.

In the classes led by Prof. Lockwood and J. Clegg Wright, at Lily Dale, some theories and assertions are presented as essential to the consistency of the whole body of relations, but they are held pretty close to the line of experimental induction, and sustained by the logic of evidence and cosmic relations. They have covered a wide range of subjects, mostly of a practical nature, or such as can be made to do service in the evolution of a science of life that embraces the physical and the spiritual relations of two worlds in one.

Prof. Lockwood deals much with chemical and electrical facts, and applies them to the solution of many problems in sociology, psychology, Spiritualism and mediumship. His lecture on mediumship was one of the best and most instructive I have heard on that subject, and his "Origin of the Soul" brought all speculation down to the facts of anatomy, physiology and reproduction, which relieves thinkers of the speculative agency that whirls the universe into a cosmic cyclone of inexhaustible mystery and uncertainty. Prof. Lockwood may find it necessary to improve his theories somewhat, and the "molecular hypothesis" may need modification, or reconstruction; but at present it appears to a novice to be consistent with what we know, and furnishes a key for the unlocking of many secret doors in the Temple of Knowledge. It seems to be sustained by the facts of nature and chemical and electrical science.

SOME ILLUSTRATIONS.

Prof. Lockwood squares all things to his ideas of Nature, and her "cosmic processes." He said "Do you ask me if I believe in materialization, I answer, I more than believe, I know it. It is sustained by all the facts of nature!" No stronger defense of mediums could well be made, than this lecture contained. But it had nothing that savored of sympathy with fraud. But he held that much was charged to fraud that was due to ignorance of mediumship and its laws and conditions. A friend consulted a medium about the sale of some property. The spirit advised him to advertise it, and that would draw attention to it, and he would watch the vibrations, and report to him when he found one that contemplated buying. In a few days the spirit reported that two persons were thinking of it, and would visit him to examine the property with a view to purchasing, within that week; and gave the name of one of the men and his locality. In a few days the purchaser came and bought the property. A day or two later the other one came, but too late to secure the bargain. This was a satisfactory "test," and the medium was credited as genuine and the spirit truthful.

ANOTHER TEST.

A man had a boiler to sell. He, too, was advised to advertise, and in due time the spirit reported a man in Oshkosh who was thinking of responding, and the spirit said he would be there in a day or two to look at the boiler. Days and weeks passed and he did not come. The investigator denounced the medium as a fraud, and the spirit a liar. But he did not attempt to follow up the case and learn the facts. Awhile after this Prof. Lockwood had occasion to visit Oshkosh, and as the spirit had given the name of the man who was about to answer the "ad," and examine the boiler, he called on him, and asked him why he did not go and examine the boiler advertised.

He replied that he did read the advertisement, and thought he would go right away and see it, with a view to purchase, if the boiler suited him, and the price was easy. But his attention was directed another way a day or two later, and so he gave it up. Now this case illustrates many. The spirit saw by his mental vibrations that he intended to go the next day and see the boiler, and so reported it through the medium. Neither spirit or medium was responsible for the man's change of mind, and this loose way of jumping to conclusions, is a common cause of error, and charges of fraud where none exist.

This is but one of many varieties of mistakes which are charged up to the medium as fraud or to the spirit world as a hotbed of liars, cheats, and vicious mischief-makers.

These illustrations are but a faint hint at the matter contained in this instructive lecture. Prof. Lockwood holds that all the phenomena of nature, physical and spiritual, are corelated, and mediumship is a scientific reality as demonstrable as the chemical relations of matter or electrical manifestations in the laboratory.

J. Clegg Wright is a psychic of remarkable powers, and he, too, corelates the physical and spiritual in all nature, and especially the human organism. He deals much with anatomy of the brain, and its psychic, as well as its physiological functions. But he makes some bold dashes out of all the order of general belief, and even defies the schools of science, and the theories of psychic researchers. He disputes the much exaggerated importance of "suggestion" and denies that hypnotic trances are induced by it. He says it is the influence of monotony that hypnotizes. As the murmur of a low voice in a lullaby song puts the infant to sleep, so the same influence acts upon the hypnotic subject; and any repetition of words, in a monotonous voice will produce the effect, whether they contain a suggestion or not.

He sometimes utters expressions that savor strongly of reincarnation; yet I think Mr. Wright in his normal state is decidedly opposed to that dogma. He claims—or something does through his organism—that when we leave this physical plane, and enter upon the new order of life, we leave the intellect behind us! That the spirit has no use for logical methods, or reason. It sees with clairvoyant eyes, and knows all things instantly by Soul Contact. This does not seem to me a reliable exposition of spirit life, and its conditions and relations.

But generally Mr. Wright's lectures are logical, rational, and consistent with nature and all we know of her principles and processes.

These class lectures, at Lily Dale, it seems to me, are of great value to Spiritualism, and ought to be extended to every camp in the land, as the grand educational basis, upon which to build a system of thought and a science of life as outlined by the best teachings we have received from the spirit world, and the whole trend of Modern Spiritualism. This does not militate against any intellectual efforts, or metaphysical speculations which other classes of thinkers may find congenial to their mental processes.

These class lectures have had a large following at Lily Dale, and have inspired much interest, and even enthusiasm, and have seemed to startle many varieties of thinkers with a realization of something valuable, amounting almost to a new revelation.

THE "TRAINING SCHOOL"

which has recently attracted so much attention, is in a different department, and has its qualified teachers in such minds as Moses Hull, A. J. Weaver, Mrs. Jahnke, Mattie E. Hull and others, and I hope for much to evolve out of this germ; and ultimately a complete blending and co-operation with the scientific efforts so well begun at Lily Dale.

Before the opening season for the camps of 1903 I hope to see this educational enterprise introduced in some way, however small and imperfect at first, that will hold the germs of a great school which may evolve according to the elements and conditions, in the making of which we may all have some part and some responsibility. Teachers of a rational and scientific tendency need to be encouraged to qualify themselves for such a work, and if my psychic insight can be trusted, there is a field for the development of scientific Spiritualism before us, in this new departure, the outworking of which will astonish the world, and establish Spiritualism in a triumphant prosperity never dreamed of before.

Except the hotel deficit, this has been the most prosperous season that Lily Dale has had in a number of years; and from many expressions that I heard it is evidently one of the best, spiritually and educationally, in the history of the camp. I heard many expressions of satisfaction from visitors to the camp, both from those who came this year for the first time and from those who have been attendants for years.

Mr. Brooks was missed by many, and his rollicking social stir-up-ativeness was not supplied by any substitute. But Rev. Thomas Grimshaw made a good chairman, and his presence impresses people with its dignity and ability so fitting to his position, and his fine spiritual nature is always inspiring to the best in his hearers.

So far as I could learn the mediums did satisfactory work, and many found for the first time, conclusive evidence of immortality and were comforted, as never before. There are many reasons for regarding this season—in spite of the unprecedented bad weather—one of the best, and most promising in the history of the camp.

THE ELECTION OF OFFICERS

on Monday, August 18, resulted in the re-election of the old board, except that Carrie E. S. Twing was elected in place of Mrs. McKeever, who resigned. But a week later Mr. Gaston made a deal that is likely to introduce some radical changes in the conduct of affairs. He has—I understand—sold out his entire interest, and retires from office, and henceforth will be only a private citizen at Lily Dale. The new board is expected to do much for the improvement and attractiveness of that already famous camp. It is said there is to be liberal contributions of money to be expended as they see best, and there is abundant chance for improvements that money will supply. Some seem to think that the class lectures will not be a feature of the meetings henceforth. But I have too much faith in the wisdom and high purposes of those who are to rule, to believe they will drop so important a feature from their program.

Very likely a new class of speakers will be introduced; and this may be well; but to omit such intellectual attractions as have made the last two years at Lily Dale famous, does not appear to me likely to be the new policy. New speakers have been introduced every year; but the majority of the old ones have been retained, and dropped one or two at a time. I welcome the change. I hope for a wise and progressive administration of affairs under the new management. I know of no other camp that has been so steadily and progressively prosperous in the best sense, and good works, as that of Lily Dale; and this is an evidence of the healthy conservatism and business qualification of its management, and also indicates their devotion to the cause for which the camp was founded, and a steady straightforward faithfulness of purpose that was not swayed by evil gossip or censorious criticisms, or private prejudices; and they go out with a good record, and I trust with good will towards all.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

Lake Brady Camp, O.

On the evening of August 20, D. A. Herrick gave a trumpet seance in Mrs. Mee's parlor for the benefit of the camp, which was well attended and was one of the most successful ever held at Brady.

On Friday evening Mrs. Ebertshauser also gave a benefit at her cottage; over forty people were present and many fine tests were given. Mrs. Ebertshauser was congratulated on her success by her many friends, it being her first public seance.

Sunday, Aug 24 was as perfect a day as one could wish for, and a large audience greeted Mrs. Marian Carpenter, the speaker for the day. The exercises were opened by the audience singing "Beulah Land." Mrs. Carpenter then read a poem by Ella Wheeler Wilcox, entitled "Love Deeper Than All." Taking for her subject, "Love the Saving Power," she gave an inspired address that was uplifting and inspiring to all who heard her.

In the afternoon the large tent was more than full, many not being able to find seats. Mrs. Carpenter was at her best and held the attention of her audience throughout the long session. Her tests were many and gave complete satisfaction.

On Tuesday there was a conference at 2 p. m., subject "Thought Transference," Mrs. Carpenter leading.

SOME EXPERIENCES,

In Connection with Mrs. Fairchild's Materializations.

To the Editor:—I wish to place upon paper a little of the lesson I have learned of life, that others so inclined may be guided by the gaining of similar satisfaction.

My meaning of life is not the living upon earth alone, but also the continued existence, as compared with which the longest earth life I am told is but as the twinkling of an eye, and the lesson to be learned is not only what to do for pleasure just now, but to know what will bring the best results both here and hereafter; and it seems to me wisest, if we wish to learn regarding any one thing, to consult with those most experienced and intelligent as to that particular line of thought, and I would add what I have been taught regarding the continued life was by those who have lived through the earth life, and passed into the continued life, and of those and the teaching I now particularly refer to, what has been given me through the cabinet of Mrs. Helen V. Fairchild, at No. 32 West Ellsworth street, Denver, Col.

Without mentioning the names, I would say that those who have been teachers or helpers of humanity in any age of the world's history have come to me through this cabinet, giving evidence of their continued interest in the welfare of humanity, not only of those contemporary with them, but of the present generations living upon earth, wishing that all may commence living in a progressive way at the earliest possible time.

These friends have occupied the materialized form not only singly but in groups of two, three, four and five at a time, not always emerging from and disappearing into the cabinet, but materializing and dematerializing in the open room, and in various degrees of light or darkness, the light being regulated by "Forest Queen," who uses the physical form of the medium during the manifestations quite as naturally as would Mrs. Fairchild herself, and while sitting conversing with this medium when not under control I have seen the form materialized and had the spirit speak to me from it, as well as talk to me with the independent spirit voice, while the medium sat silently at the other side of the room.

What do they say?

Well, there is nothing good, helpful and encouraging that I know of which they have not said to me.

Of the other cabinet controls I would say that Dr. De La Mar materialized as close to my side as to carry my hand and arm into the air with his head under it when he came to speak with a voice more clear, louder and forceful than that of any ordinary human being, giving abundant evidence of his knowledge of chemistry and law to control the elements necessary for his purpose, and moving more actively in the materialized form than most people use the physical body, while his co-laborer, the distinguished Dr. Rush, rises in close proximity in front of your chair, giving fraternal greeting and teaching most pleasing to the ear, to be succeeded by the athletic Black Hawk from under the chair with a clear hearty "How do," and "Good Moon," Chief.

The sweet little spirits, Mazie, Geraldine, Pinkie and others all fulfill their mission in assisting to give mortals the most complete and abundant evidence of the fact that they continue to live after so-called death, and can hold communion with those yet remaining in the earth life, through the marvelous mediumship of this gifted woman, who is as much a prophetess as any of the oracles of the olden time, and whose comfortable brick home is as much a temple and Mecca for seekers after truth as the shrine of any sanctuary, in any time, and so well do the people of Denver and visitors from other parts of the world appreciate the fact, that all of her time which can possibly be used for manifestations is engaged months ahead for private seances, so much so that she has been an entire year in finishing up engagements preparatory for leaving for the Pacific Coast, where she expects to go in October of 1902, and remain through the winter for a change of climate, but will continue her mission to mortals there, and to those who desire evidence of continued life and spirit communion I would say, do not miss the opportunity of getting it through this world-wide accepted source, in one or more seances, and while the public seance is good, the private one is better, and there are some individuals who have engaged 100 private seances at one time and then wanted more.

To those not familiar with the facts, I would say that Mrs. Fairchild has visited various parts of the world under contract to give seances, and the manifestations through her cabinet in Cincinnati, under the auspices of Dr. Wolff, and strictest test conditions, have been reported in detail through the Spiritual press.

Her cabinet stands in the middle of the room in the form of a Japanese screen opened into a square with a curtain in front, and during a seance sun or moon light is excluded from the room, and a wax candle burning in a box in one corner furnishes a subdued light, and a music box, strains of harmonious music, while the varied manifestations are presented sometimes with the medium sitting in the cabinet, but more often outside of it.

These manifestations are too marvelous to describe understandingly, and must be experienced by each individual to be comprehended, but I will mention the singing in German, by one spirit, of several operas and songs in a sweet voice, loud, clear and distinct enough to be heard plainly in any ordinary hall, and I would also mention the fact that one evening I called upon the lady just before dark, and as I sat talking with her in her reception room with doors and windows wide open, what appeared like a little bunch of lace or moonlight formed upon the floor at my feet, gradually rose to the height of an ordinary human being, expanded into a complete form, gave name, and when I rose to my feet somewhat startled and astonished, held a businesslike and intelligent conversation with me, and then retired to the cabinet, which Mrs. Fairchild had meantime placed in position, giving evidence beyond question of the positive truth of all that is claimed for spirit power; and the friends there told me they very much preferred speaking with me with their own intelligence direct from the materialized form than in any other way, and I would advise every intelligent person on the Pacific Coast to take advantage of the opportunity to investigate for themselves the truth of spirit communion as demonstrated through the mediumship of Mrs. Fairchild during the coming winter.

DR. C. E. WATKINS,

THE WONDERFUL

CHRONIST.

John King, M. D., the great writer and authority on Chronic Diseases, says that a Chronist is one who cures CHRONIC DISEASE. This being the case, then Dr. Watkins is certainly a CHRONIST, because he CURES chronic disease. Does not doctor, patch up, but cures. Do you desire to be cured? Let us reason together. You have been suffering for years trying this "Doctor," and that "Physician," and in spite of strong, drastic drugs given to you in toxic doses you still live. Well, this fact should teach you that nature is stronger than disease. This being the case, now, don't you think if some one who has been a closer student of nature than you have, should teach you what nature wants you to do to get well, that it would help you to recover your health? And then again, if you should place yourself in the hands of a Chronist, who uses only nature's remedies and laws to to cure disease, don't you think you would have a better chance to get well? Let us see what Dr. Watkins says about nature being the real Physician. Let us see what a Chronist who cures Chronic disease says. Remember, kind friend, that these words are the words of a regular Graduate of Medicine, but who was never guilty of trying to make nature obey the medical books and the opinions of medical men, but are the words of one who is now only a Student of nature. Write him today for his book on Chronic Disease which will be sent you free.

ETHEREAL SUBSTANCE.

A Natural Philosophy of Existence.

Science traces the earth and entire universe back to nebulas such as are now seen forming in different ether spaces. Common sense says these nebulas are necessarily the self-development of some manner of ethereal substance. This ethereal substance has no properties in which we can see it, therefore none in which we can comprehend it. Calling it God, matter, or by any of the philosophical names, does not enable us to comprehend it; it is just as incomprehensible under one name as another.

We have called it Ethia—hence Ethianism—not that in doing so we were any wiser, but because that term is less cumbrous and more dignified, and because the ethereal substance has much more the appearance of a mother than a father.

It is evident that if nebulas were the self-development of the ethereal substance, the world to-day is. The elements are the utmost reach of our capacities; whatever was beyond them in nebulas is beyond them now. That is, the ethereal substance is the incomprehensible essence, fundamental principle or noumenon of the world; it is the noumenon underlying all phenomena both physical and spiritual. Calling it other names does not alter the fact.

Now we don't suppose The Progressive Thinker is particularly fond of catechisms—may have got disgusted with them early in life at Sunday-school—but suppose we ask some of the leading questions in the name of God, and answer from the ethian viewpoint. Perhaps it is the better way to get at what ethianism is.

Did the world have a beginning? Yes; in the incomprehensible ethereal substance. Nebula, or the "without form and void," was a beginning only in the sense that at that point the world first hove into view, or came within the sphere of observation.

Is creation, or is evolution, the proper term for the process by which the worlds become what they are now?

It is a case of self-development beginning in the incomprehensible ethereal substance and ending to date in the world as it is. But perhaps you would not be excommunicated for calling the process up to nebula, creation; and the process from nebula on up to present conditions, evolution. The important difference being that in one case you can't comprehend the process; in the other, you can. The "inspired" people cover their "domain" with a single sentence: In the beginning God created the heavens and earth which were without form and void, or nebulous. That account can therefore be commended for its brevity.

Is God the world, the world, God; as pantheists say; or is God distinct from the world, as the church theory says?

It is well to state that church theory and practice in this matter do not jingle together. Constantly the church speaks of what the world does as something God does. That is pantheism; and pantheists are infidels, so church theory says. It is discouraging.

As the world is the self-development of the ethereal substance, of that substance it altogether is; and we could fall into the pernicious church habit of speaking of what Ethia does instead of what the world does. But the world, by its limitations in time and space and its physical properties and spiritual attributes; that is, by the conditions which make it a world, is demarked or differentiated from the ethereal substance which as an infinity has not these limitations and properties.

Another reason for supposing ethia distinct from the world is that even now we get light and heat from sun and star, which is said to be motion of an omnipresent ethereal substance. We may therefore speak of the world as "fixed" ethereal substance—fixed in form and conduct. Also of "free" ethereal substance as being in all things, all things in it, and in it all things move and have their being.

To account for the planet passing through ether without disturbing it, and without being impeded by it, some have advanced the "sieve" theory. But sieve, nothing! If the earth were anything like a sieve certain church souls would fall through it any morning before breakfast.

Does God govern the world?

Perchance the world needs no government, except such as it gives itself. If the ethereal substance has the intelligence and volition to self-develop into the world of things, those things, planet and all, have the intelligent volition of what they do. That these things act in accordance with invariable "law" certainly does not prove that law governs them; the act comes first; the law after the thing is done.

Is the world altogether physical, or altogether spiritual?

The ethereal substance, which is neither matter, spirit nor force, self-develops into the universe along the two lines, physical and spiritual. The physical is the passive or inert side of the world; the spiritual is the active, controlling side. Force is not in it; unless by force you mean spirit. Whatever is the controlling element in man is the active element everywhere. This manifesting herself to our senses in certain space and time in the physical properties sound, color and the like, is the physical individual or thing; manifesting herself in certain space and time in thought emotion and volition to our consciousness is the spirit individual. To say these two radically different groups of properties, apprehended by radically different capacities, are one and the same individual, is to say nonsense, and calls for anathema. The only sameness in the physical and spiritual individual is their noumenon, the ethereal substance.

Do the prayers of the righteous avail much?

They don't protect churches against lightning, nor keep a log from rolling over you. Neither will they fill the meal-barrel. The "free" ethia does not in any case annul the "fixed" laws. And if she does not now, she never did. That miracles come from away back and do not thrive in a critical age, is a most discouraging circumstance. Still you might be benefited by breathing in blessings from the free ethia, if you do not ask her to "break the law." Try it; and watch results: If it does not kill you the mushroom is of the edible kind. If ethia saw fit to self-develop into the world in the first instance, why not willing to aid in carrying it on to the desired end? The religious scientist tells us that it is impossible to account for the progress made by the world since nebula or any other theory than that of a constant influx of "divine" energy—from the "free," omnipresent, ethia.

Is it the great business of life to worship God?

If so, the place to do it is in the great temple of nature, every day in the week, science officiating when necessary. Not in the tabernacle on Sunday because of the dry-bone stories which the priest tells, and which perhaps you do not believe all the same. But one should be very careful about praising God for what he has done for man. Ethia self-developed into the world because of her own pleasure in the matter. When you thank her, as if it was all done for you, you place yourself in a most ridiculous light, and should feel bad about it.

Was Christ the only son of God?

All men are sons of ethia, or the ethereal substance; divine in essence; human as an individual, or in limitations, properties and attributes. A great many men have been reformers and have suffered for it; on the cross, at the stake, in the calaboose and at the bar of "established" public opinion. Others have been more like devils and fared real well. "Maybe you be one of them."

Is there a heaven and a hell?

There may be a purely spiritual system of existence into which we pass through the door of death. Ethia may have self-developed into a lot of other systems than the universe, each higher because more like herself. And we may pass through them all and finally be prepared to "look on her face, yet live." This life hardly qualifies even the parson to jump into the presence of the living God.

Is the soul the only thing that goes? Oh, no! the entire spiritual man; the intellect, emotional nature, are nature and the whole outfit.

What must we do to be saved?

Save yourself here, and you'll be all right there; it's the only way to do it. If you need any instructions in the great moral principles, consult Christ or any of the "teachers;" they all teach about the same things, and often in the same language. The trouble with these is that they make small mention of the nicer amenities which make up the "bulk" of a well ordered life. But really why should not this age know as much as those remote ages. Almost any one should be able to make out that it was not right to kill a man for his money.

Why did God create the world?

It may be, as certain philosophy suggests, that ethia's purpose in self-developing into the world is to view herself objectively. This man is able to do, as through a glass darkly.

Should we be good?

Oh, yes! But because it is good—not to keep out of torment. And we ought to know as much about what is good as they did in the time of Moses. We can be "good" to ourselves and others and in this way be good to the Gods. We can't help the Gods much in any other way.

Was man made perfect in his "beginning?"

Hardly. All the "profane" evidence is that he was not. He comes up out of prehistoric ages in very bad shape. The presumption is that in these prehistoric ages, and in his beginning, he was yet less commendable. Progress, not retrogression, is the order of ethia's self-development into all things. But we can readily understand why the "sacred" account has Adam and Eve made perfect and places them in a perfect environment. It was necessary to the theory that man was the "whole thing" in the sight of God. As in the time of Moses man was not perfect he must account for men's degeneration. The devil did it. Now, the church must have God make amends for having made the Devil, by sending his only son to save man. Still the majority go the broad road. Verily, he spoke a mess. All in a vain effort to prove that man was God's sole concern in the creation of the world.

This catechism, like the parson's sermon, could be lengthened out indefinitely; but already there is enough to show the trend of Ethianism. If you cared for anything farther you will find it in my book.* The price is cut, not that it ought to be, but to more readily get this matter before the good people for judgment. F. J. RIPLEY.

Sycamore Grove Camp, Cal.

One week and two Sundays of the camp-meeting have successfully and pleasantly passed away. The lectures have been of a high order and well attended, and the phenomenal workers have also been well patronized. People whom the writer met on the grounds last year as inquirers, for the first time, of the truth of Spiritualism, and that apparently by mere accident, are here this year encamped for the season—full-fledged, enthusiastic believers, with all the young convert's love and ardor. Spiritualism seems to be growing rapidly in this part of the world in the number of subscribers to its teachings. I have heard it said that it has been estimated that there are ten thousand Spiritualists in Los Angeles. The persecution to which the cause has been subjected in "The City of the Angels" (perhaps it is well-named) seems to have increased the interest of the people in the cult.

I saw Dr. and Mrs. Chesbrough on the grounds yesterday. Both are looking well, despite their experiences in the police court, etc. They say their case is practically ended, but yet it apparently hangs over their heads, like the sword of Damocles.

The speakers of the day, yesterday, were Mrs. Watson and Mrs. Lillie, and they both sustained their high reputation. Mrs. Watson spoke in the morning, on "The Sunrise of Religion." Mrs. Lillie in the afternoon, on a subject from the audience. It was one that had been suggested by a minister who said that Spiritualists are people who lacked faith in God. Without going very deep into the God question, Mrs. Lillie yet handled the subject to the apparent approval of the large audience.

Mrs. Cowell, of Oakland, followed with messages. She is full and definite in her description of persons and localities. J. W. Henley followed with a special test seance. His messages are clear cut, and pretty generally recognized.

In the evening Mrs. Watson spoke again, taking for her subject, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Her guides explained that all are doing the best they can under the conditions in which they find themselves. Ignorance is at the bottom of all wrong doing. Whatever is, is the result of what has gone before, is the natural effect of a natural cause, and whatever is, is right until it can be made better.

A large crowd was in attendance all day.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Cleora, beloved wife of Volney Barber, passed to the higher life, August 26, after a very brief illness. She lived to be 75 years of age, and was dearly loved by all who knew her. Funeral services were conducted under the auspices of The Occult Band of Harmony of Decatur, Ill., and the oration, both at the residence and cemetery, was given by Prof. J. Dickey, medium, late of Grand Rapids, Mich. COR.

Passed to spirit life, my only brother, Walter Hyde, August 13, aged 77 years, after an illness of six months with lagrippe and heart disease. He had lived more in spirit than in the mortal for several years, with ideality and spirituality well developed. Everybody among his circle of friends listened with rapt attention to the words of wisdom that fell from his lips, and little children, wherever he went, called him Uncle Walter. Mrs. Sarah Seal, in her beautiful address contrasted his riches with those of the millionaires. He could take his treasures with him while the millionaires' treasures were left behind. We console ourselves that our loss is his gain.

WHY BE SICK?

Dr. J. M. Peebles the Famous Physician and Scientist Has Perfected a System of Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Sufferer.

Read His Valuable Book, "A Message of Hope"—It will Explain to You His Wonderful Treatment and Tell You How You Can be Healed.

Why will you continue to suffer when there is a treatment at hand that will cure you? Dr. Peebles and his associates, all physicians of wide experience and reputation, have perfected a system of treatment that promises health and strength to all.

J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D.

Many of their cures seem almost like miracles, for hundreds of those restored had traveled far and wide, trying this doctor and that, without getting any relief and were about to give up in despair when they began the treatment of Dr. Peebles.

They are able to do such wonderful cures because they work in harmony with nature, and employ her mighty healing forces in connection with mild, scientifically prepared medicinal remedies. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the depleted system, enriches the blood, improves digestion and assimilation, gives strength and tone to weakened nerves and muscles, and permanently repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing thousands of the sick to rejoice at being healed.

Why don't you sit down, at once, and write the doctors a plain, truthful letter as to your condition as you see it? If you will do this, they will carefully examine your case and send you a full diagnosis of your condition, and tell you truthfully whether or not they can cure you. This will cost you nothing, and if they find they can cure you, they will make their charges so small that anyone can afford the treatment.

If you are sick, write them at once for their full diagnosis and professional advice which will be sent without charge, together with their wonderful book, "A Message of Hope," which will explain fully this grand system of treatment and give you information that will brighten the remainder of your life. Epilepsy Cured.

At Last a Positive and Permanent Cure for This Terrible Maladay Is Discovered.

The renowned Brain and Nerve Specialist, Dr. Charles W. Green, of Battle Creek, Mich., has at last found a positive cure for Epilepsy, or Fits.

Epilepsy has baffled the medical world since the time of Hippocrates, and not until the Eminent Specialist, Dr. Green, patiently worked out his great cure has a positive cure for Epilepsy been known. The Doctor has used it in every case of fits he has treated in the past five years, hundreds of whom had tried everything they could hear of before taking his treatment, and he has yet to find the case, not due to injury, that it will not cure.

Mrs. Lizzie Green, of Boston, says: I cannot thank you enough for my deliverance from that terrible disease, Epilepsy. I had suffered with it for thirty years and had tried everything I could hear of, but the attacks only grew harder and more frequent. I had given up all hope when one of my neighbors told me of your great cure. I should not have written this if she had not urged me, for I had been fooled so often that I had resolved to pay out no more money. God bless her for urging me for you cured me and saved me from a life worse than death." Do not experiment longer with "Free Cures" and worthless nostrums containing injurious hypnotics, etc., but write at once to Dr. Charles W. Green, 214 Monroe St., Battle Creek, Mich., for full particulars of this great and tried remedy. It will cure you and brighten the end of your life. Write at once giving full facts about your case; the doctor will tell you exactly what can be done for you. Remember the treatment is positively guaranteed.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 26. CHICAGO, ILL., SEPT. 13, 1902. NO. 668.

DR. PHELON'S LETTER.

Brief Notes on Various Matters of Interest.

While in the North and East, wet weather, interspersed with occasional hot spells, seems to be the order of the season, we are blessed with about the usual output. The reports of the incoming crops are above the average. During the whole summer, San Francisco has had no day in which one, mopping his forehead the while, would say, "This is hot." But San Francisco is not the whole State, by any means. So we hear of valleys in the mountains, and table lands cut off by the ranges of towering peaks, from the breath of the Pacific Ocean, which have thermometers constantly impressing such assertions as 125 and 135 degrees upon their unsophisticated owners. "You pays your money and you takes your choice" of the kind of weather you want.

The squabble of politics is still intensifying, but the day of the nominating convention is close at hand, when the first round of this plug-ugly fight will give us some idea of what next. The earnestness which a San Franciscan contrives to throw into the trivialities of life, is one of the charming characteristics of this city. This is the reason we are the watering place without compare; the resort of moneyed leisure and the Mecca of all excursion parties from anywhere, who seek to be strictly en regle. When the returns of election and other times come in, everybody and his fammy go down to newspaper square to "get the returns" and see the illumination. Of course, we illuminate, we always do, on the slightest pretext. Then all the people and the children that have any wind in their lungs, shout and blow tin horns and glorify the great god of noisy discord. It has been said by good judges that San Francisco is the American Paris. We believe the statement to be correct.

On every hand are signs of the preparation for the Fall trade. Although we have no distinctive marking of the four seasons here, we are compelled to be in unison with the rest of the world.

The Southern California Camp-Meeting opened on Sunday, August 17, at Los Angeles. The secretary, J. D. Griffith, is at the hospital making a struggle for life. There is, however, no lack in the movement of the official balance-wheel at the convention. Many able speakers and psychics from all parts of the State are present, each and all striving to make it the success everybody desires it to be.

Capt. Walrond, of Denver, Colorado, since our last Progressive Thinker missive, and gave some account of the Spiritualist Temple to be built at Denver, in the near future, for the use of the whole cult of mystery dispensers, who are seeking to know the good, in all its phases. Ten thousand dollars are already promised. It is to be of white marble in the Oriental style of architecture. Its proposed location has been determined, but for the present that is the Captain's secret. The health and strength that he left Denver to search for, are slowly coming back. May there be no reversing of the lever of progress.

We notice that an organization has been started for a postal league to agitate for the correction of abuses of power in the Post Office Department of the government. There has been a great deal of smoke lately, over the decisions of the postal authorities. It seems under the rulings, as if there were one kind of law for one set of fellows, and another for the others. Is this what the American has a right to expect from his government? Our boast has always been, "one law for rich or poor," and neither thought nor creed were to be discriminated against. A postal league of the people can do no harm, by bringing the search-light of Truth to bear upon any ways that are crooked or dark, in the autocratic management of this department.

Mrs. Elizabeth Clark, a well-known medium of this city, had a birthday lately. She is the head of a local organization, called the "Sisterhood of the Western Links." Quite a number of the sisters and some of her other friends dropped in, in the evening, to see how the new burden was likely to be endured, and to assure her that she was growing younger. Henry Harrison Brown, the apostle of the I Am, publisher of the monthly "Now," and of three pamphlets of recent issue, dealing with hypnotic suggestion, was also present, and neatly congratulated the heroine of the hour, in behalf of her many friends, present and absent, on her attainment of another birthday.

We understand that the inspirational artist, H. A. Streight, has through financial losses been unable to finish the home he was erecting on this coast as a shelter for his old age. He is still painting, however, and has some pictures on hand of California scenery, that are said to be fine. If some of his many friends could help him to the sales of these, and others he is still creating, it would be a service to him, and those who use him as their instrument.

A party of geological explorers from Berkeley University, have been at work at Mount Shasta. They have discovered the remains of the great cave bear, and of the giant sloth, and some other remains of supposed extinct animals. Perhaps after all, the ark might have rested on Mount Shasta, instead of Mount Ararat. I do not suppose the chronicler knew which one it was, either.

For many years, Americanized Europeans who are on this continent to stay, always, like Lot's wife, looked behind them for the best, both for raw material and manufactured product. In the plan of the universe, it was the wisest and best item to have the indomitable old Puritans settle bleak New England; thus setting up among the first industries of the country a manufactory of bodies and brains. Both were needed. If they could stand the bleak idiosyncrasies of the crags and peaks from Maine to Connecticut, there could be nothing for them unconquerable. The "brain factories," Harvard, Yale, Brown and Bowdoin, have succeeded in dominating the whole of the scholastic thought of the nation. It is not now necessary to go to Oxford, or Edinburg for the highest scholarly finish. As brains lead, so other things follow, manifesting even on the material plane. As "Westward the Star of Empire has moved," the leaders have been New England born or they have furnished the funds. The increasing fertility of extensive areas has given us new methods, from the mower and reaper, to the most improved methods of irrigation. When California was reached we find the half has not been told. And now France, the land par excellence of the prune, comes this year to the farthest State west for its domestic supplies of a native fruit. Next?

As evidence that the church is neither moribund nor dead, two magnificent edifices, one Protestant, the other of the Holy Catholic faith, were dedicated since my last letter. They were consecrated to God on the same day, in a city whose church edifices have seating capacity for ten times the number of church-goers. It is evidently the number of churches and not church-goers they seek to increase.

The irregular guerillas, better known as the Salvation Army, have been enjoying a special demonstration on the account of the presence here of Booth Tucker. As Booth is the name the S. A. conjure by, it is to be presumed he is some relation of Gen. William Booth, who was undoubtedly a close companion of Dowie, Torquemada and that ilk, in their last incarnation. The most sensible thing we have heard of the old General is that he is a Spiritualist and has "spells" of talking with his wife who is in spirit life.

There are some questions that startle us by their abruptness. As we were on a city-bound street car the other day and saw the cigarettes, cigars and pipes of all varieties, the question flashed upon my mind, what did the world do without tobacco, previous to its discovery on the Western Continent in 1559, not quite three hundred years ago? Knowing what we know of its uses and effects now, on all planes of life, can we, at the present time, imagine a place or people, that has not some reminding odor of the fragrant(?) cigar, or the aged pipe? Have we any idea of how much the amity of nations, at the present day, is due to the soothing influences of the chief narcotic of the world? What did Adam do without it in the Garden of Eden? When he gracefully reclined on a stone lounge cushioned with heaped leaves, wearied with his day's "rasslin" with the animals, how could he plan, without a smoke, what he would do with that wall-eyed Mastodon; or that conniptious Ichthyosaurus, on the coming morrow. How did Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and the Twelve; or Moses and Aaaron manage to soothe their disturbed mental perplexities when the abnormalities of the common conditions for the "coming race" presented themselves for everyday solution? A little later on, where did Hannibal or Alexander or Julius Caesar find refreshing for fagg'd brain and tired bodies without toby? Perhaps there was some secret medicament concealed in the incense from the temple altars, that partially filled the bill. Who will disclose unto this generation, the secret? Did the ancestors miss anything, or are we supercharged with narcotic stimulation as a race?

The present generation are deeply attached to short sermons. In fact, they dote on them. We find the following model "going the rounds." It was a hot Sunday. A preacher in Michigan had been requested to cut it at both ends and omit the middle. His text was: There was a certain rich man, name of Dives. There was a beggar named Lazarus who sat at his gate. Lazarus died and the angels carried him carefully away and laid him in Abraham's bosom. Dives died and the flyers that are not angels, toted him out, and dropped him in the hot place with an unfashionable name. He saw Lazarus sleeping in his new resting place. Naturally, he thought that he had done so much for himself, that Abraham might let the beggar bring him a drop of water on the tip of his finger. But Abraham would not. The sermon followed thus: Three persons, Dives, Lazarus and Abraham. It was a hot day, almost as hot as this. Dives was hot, he wanted to get out. So do we. Let us pray.

We notice that the Paris surgeons have taken a step or two in advance of their confreres in the rest of the world. When they have a capital operation, like the opening of the pleural cavity, or the pericardium, or the removal of the appendix cæci vermiformis, in sewing up the incision, they leave some of their paraphernalia inside. What the motive is, they have not yet deigned to explain to a waiting world. Perhaps it is to provide for invisible hands means to foreclose any disastrous sequelæ. We know the Paris surgeons are ahead in the brilliancy of their cutting, as well as in the size of their death-roll of patients who fail to recover. The dare and dash of the operating-table are all to the Paris surgeon. Results do not count. But how about the patient?

AT SET OF SUN.

If we sit down at set of sun
And count the things that we have done,
And counting find
One self-denying act, one word
That eased the heart of him who heard,
One glance most kind
That fell like sunshine where it went,
Then we may count the day well spent.

But if through all the livelong day
We've eased no heart by yea or nay;
If through it all
We've done no thing that we can trace
That brought the sunshine to a face;
No act, most small,
That helped a soul and nothing cost,
Then count that day as worse than lost.

Origin of Life: Rebuttal

Eld. H. W. B. Myrick Gives His Final Word on the Question.

In The Progressive Thinker, No. 654, Prof. Loveland had an article, a review of "Mathematical Argument." In that article he professed the baldest kind of materialism. What then is materialism? Let us see.

Prof. Huxley said: "If it were given me to look beyond the abyss of geologically recorded time to the still more remote period when the earth was passing through physical and chemical conditions which it will no more see, I should expect to be a witness of the evolution of protoplasm from non-living matter."

Prof. Tyndall, in the famous Belfast Address, said: "I see in matter the promise and potency of every form of terrestrial life."

Ernest Haeckel, of the University of Jena, said: "Life came into existence, not by supernatural creation, but by spontaneous generation out of inorganic matter."

These are the three great names of modern scientific materialism. They hold that life arose out of that which had no life. Matter gave birth to life and mind. Matter, during certain supposed physical and chemical changes in remote ages of the past, produced protoplasm, living matter, by spontaneous generation.

Prof. Loveland espoused this idea in his article which I reviewed. Let me quote again. "The prima facie evidence declared that causative energy pertained to matter, and that mind was limited and controlled by matter." Read again his entire article. The whole tenor of it opposes any such thing as life or mind causing the phenomena of creation, and asserts that matter is the cause. A "succession of forms appear," he tells us, not as the result of life acting intelligently, but because "in it (that is matter) exist atoms, molecules, tendencies, forces, which necessitate motion, which, with attraction and repulsion, create an endless succession of forms."

In No. 654 J. S. Loveland was a materialist and matter is the cause of things, even limiting and controlling mind and life in its operations. But after I had pricked that bubble he comes out in No. 666 and reverses himself upon the question at issue. He now says that life is eternal: that it not only had no origin but "is itself originator and cause." In No. 654 he had certain "tendencies, forces, which with attraction and repulsion caused forms to appear." Now it is life that originates and causes forms to appear. Alas! for those famous "atoms and molecules," for those erstwhile potent "attractions and repulsions." Prof. Loveland, who fondly paraded them as the creative forces of matter twelve weeks ago, now unceremoniously kicks them out of the way and tells us that it is life that originates and causes. Then "atoms, molecules, tendencies and forces," he said, "necessitated motion (of the atoms I suppose) which (motion) with attraction and repulsion cause forms to appear." In other words, and stripped of its absurd verbosity, atoms and molecules, when put in motion by attraction and repulsion, cause forms of life and intelligence to appear. This is rank materialism, and, ashamed of the statement, of its bad grammar and wretched poverty of reason, he deliberately repudiates his first effort and promulgates an entirely new doctrine in his last. He ejects matter from the honored place of King Cause and crowns a new monarch, namely, Life. He simply reverses himself under pressure, and in so doing not only ingloriously gives up his former contention but surrenders the very citadel of scientific materialism. I congratulate the gentleman. Life, not matter, is the originator and cause. So says our valorous knight from Summerland, and, yielding to the clerical impulse, I say, Amen!

He still insists that an effect may be greater than its cause. It hardly seems possible that an intelligent man would so argue. He cannot name a reputable physicist or scientific investigator in the world to sustain such an absurdity. I defy him to mention any scientist of note teaching this monstrosity of belief. He says growth, progression prove it. They most emphatically do not. An oak is greater than an acorn but not greater than the oak before which produced the acorn. For every particle of growth, for every step of progress, there is a full and adequate cause. The germ is the initial cause, say, capable of expansion, and is re-enforced and strengthened by additional causes all along the way of growth. Let him produce a tree that had no tree back of it: a plant that never was preceded by another like plant: a man or beast, any living form in fact, which had not a living progenitor of the same kind from which it sprang. Let him do this and his cause is sustained and we will admit that effects transcend their causes.

In his first article he said: "Cause is not any more first than positive is first or before negative." And in his last he said: "The assumption of a First Cause implies that cause existed prior to effect, hence the Beginning was the production of the first effect." In order to get rid of a First Cause he asserts that cause is not first or before effect. But he lops off his own head in the second paragraph by saying: "Forms begin and end." Sure enough, they do. Something causes them to begin and the cause exists before the "form" which it causes to begin. The "form" begins; it was caused to "begin;" hence cause exists before effect. But why argue? The assertion that cause is not before effect is the language of desperation, the incoherent muttering of one bewildered.

He sneeringly asks me what the Great First Cause was doing before it produced the first effect or Beginning. "The Infinite Intelligence was asleep," he remarks. Let us see. J. S. Loveland is a cause. He produces effects, such as moving a chair, eating bread, writing an article, etc. Before he does these things he thinks, plans, decides: then he acts. Well, I suppose the Great First Cause had as much sense as Prof. Loveland. If so it was probably thinking and deciding what to do before doing it. So much for his cheap wit. He is as unfortunate in his wit as in his logic.

Now let him consider this. Matter is eternal, had no beginning, he says. Also, he informs us, life had no beginning, always existed. Life, acting on matter, originates, causes "a succession of forms to appear." I understand this to be his new or present position. And that while matter and life are eternal, "forms begin and end." Very well so far. Myself, nor any ardent Theist, can ask more of him up to this point.

But at this point we ask: Is not eternal life also eternal intelligence? Intelligence exists, thought, reason, wisdom. It is here, always was here, so far as we know. Prof. Loveland himself says: "Something never emerges from nothing." Hence intelligence, reason, thought always existed. Life, which he says causes or originates, did not then blindly and mindlessly operate upon dead matter in causing "a succession of forms to appear." Intelligence was co-etaneous and co-eternal with life. The Great First Cause was not only living but intelligent. And now abideth these three, life, matter and intelligence, the great trinity of cosmic forces and material.

I am done. I shall say no more of the Professor's vagaries. I plead guilty to the charge of laughing at, and ridiculing him. But, Brother, I will not do it any more. And, honestly, I find in most of your articles much of value. I appreciate your worth in spite of the laugh.

POVERTY:

Its Mental Cause and Means of Cure.

The cause of poverty and insufficiency in temporal affairs must be sought for beneath the web of untoward circumstances; its roots are in the mental realm, while its branches and fruitage develop in the more external influences.

The casual observer looks to these external, transient circumstantial conditions as the cause, not realizing that, at least in the majority of cases, these are but the external expression of internal facts.

Too long have we been taught to ascribe these manifestations to the will of Deity—that it is God's purpose with us, etc.—forgetting the statement: "As a man thinketh, so is he."

Poverty, then, may be regarded as a temporal degeneracy—a pathological economic and financial condition which has resulted, firstly, from a misguided education concerning man's natural rights, and secondly, from improperly organized mental factors, and an improper adaptation of means to ends.

That this is so, let us call in evidence the many distinguished men and women, many of whom are now looking upon the scenes of mortal life with purposes of fraternal helpfulness to mortals. How many have found the key to their success in life (no matter what line they pursued) in the old, old adage: "Where there is a will, there is a way?" The will, or purpose was first, then the way revealed itself to their inner perceptions or vision. And, following carefully this revealed way, success finally crowned their efforts.

Before going further, let us look at another recognized factor for temporal success, viz.: "Necessity is the mother of invention!"

As long as the mind does not recognize a necessity for improvement, and is content with the conditions that are, so long, probably, will circumstances continue to develop the same state of things generally; but, to recognize a necessity by aspiring to better environments, the inventions by which said betterment can be realized will materialize and present themselves for adoption.

What, then, is the real source of success? Primarily, it is a definitely outlined purpose existing in the mind, and which has been formulated by the recognized necessity for improvement.

This definitely outlined purpose would serve as a mould around which the improved temporal and spiritual conditions materialize.

Let us now consider a method by which the mind can come into proper relation with the conditions for improvement, provided the desire for such improvement is created. The first essential to success is courage and self-reliance. Think often in your heart and soul: "I can, and I will!" Then relax the outward will, close the physical eyes, especially if they divert you from the proper degree of concentration, and mentally look into your environments—the web of circumstances that hold you where you are. Study the situation carefully with a view to finding the way out into the more desirable conditions and fields of action. Repeat this exercise daily, and the ways and means for success will be revealed. While the full measure of success may not come as soon as you might wish, it will come sooner or later, if you persevere.

Then, by continued watchfulness and care, the desired purpose is not only maintained, but is improved and added to, and your well-being is continued.

Besides finding the way, through the above methods, out of temporal embarrassments, etc., you will also unfold in your spiritual and mediumistic nature, if the windows of your soul that look out upon the angel side of life be kept uncurtained, and you watch at the same time for the coming and going of your spirit friends.

Let us not forget that we may have the helping hand of the bright ones in any worthy purpose. They understand and see through difficulties that confront us, and know how to pilot our bark safely. If they throw on the light of inspiration, behold we see our way more clearly.

In conclusion let me say: The primary cause of poverty is in the mind; and the cure must be applied in such way as to eradicate from the mind the concepts of poverty—substituting concepts of well-being and an aspiration for better things.

Do Not Sacrifice Wealth Upon the Grave.

It makes me shudder to see the vast waste of money on all sides when I walk or drive through any of the large cemeteries.

Has it ever occurred to you to wonder at the large amount of money that is spent yearly by relatives and friends on tombstones and monuments that are built to commemorate the virtues of the dead?

Think of the immense amount of good that could be accomplished if the money used in erecting these vain tributes were used in a wiser and more intelligent way.

A man's character, while living depends upon his thoughts and actions in relation to not only his friends, but all humanity. So, in trying to think of something to show the world as a proof of his worth, how much more lasting and more far-reaching would be his memory if, instead of a helpless stone placed on his grave, some beneficial act were started in his name.

The best monument that a man can have is some well-continued activity or institution that may be started so that the rest of mankind can be benefited by it—something that will educate or aid the living.

That there are many who take this view of commemorating the dead is shown by the many scholarships, small parks, hospitals and so forth that have been started with the idea of helping others.

Those who cannot afford anything on so large a scale, if they look around a little, can easily find various smaller openings for aid in the charitable line among the working girls and the poor children, also individual cases that no one is unfortunate enough to escape.

Death is merely the passage from one plane of consciousness to another. It does not mean cessation of life.

Why, then, should a stone typify man's departure from this plane of consciousness to the next?—Margaret Stowe in Chicago American.

IMPORTANT MATTERS

From the N. S. A. Home Office, Washington, D. C.

To the Editor, and Friends:—Again the N. S. A. sends greetings to you one and all, with sincere thanks for all kindness expressed towards it and its good work by the editors of the spiritual papers, and by the public at large. We appreciate all courtesies, and trust to merit them by our fidelity to the work and to the cause of Spiritualism. The sincere thanks of the N. S. A. and its officers are hereby extended to the managers of the various camps, who in any way gave aid and encouragement to the work of the N. S. A., during the summer just past, and to all mediums and speakers who also contributed of their talent and influence at camps and otherwise, towards the work and objects of the National Spiritualists Association.

Since my last report in the papers, the Mediums' Relief Fund and the Mediums' Home have received the following contributions: A Friend in Illinois, Bond County, $100; Stephen Carding, $1; Geo. A. Lovett, $1; Mrs. Maria Dudley, $1; Mrs. Carter Rogers, $5; John F. Himes, $5; E. J. Sweet, $1; Fred Bruner, $1; Mrs. P. E. Dawn, $5; seance Terra Haute, Ind, per G. W. Kates, $7; "Widow's Mite," 10 cents. The full amount received including these figures and former reports is $538.20. This does not include the hundred dollars contributed by Dr. Spinney in sanitarium service, nor the fifteen hundred dollars contributed jointly by the two benevolent members of the N. S. A. board, before mentioned, but the amount received by the contributions from the public at large. The work of paying a pension of twelve dollars a month each to four veteran mediums continues, and we desire to increase the list as soon as funds will allow.

MARY T. LONGLEY,
Secretary N. S. A.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Kindly say to the Spiritualists of Illinois and neighboring states that all attempts made in Chicago to secure one fare for the round trip to Boston for the N. S. A. meeting, October 21, 22, 23, 24, have failed. The various railroad lines are watching each other so closely that each one is afraid of all the others, and in one or two recent instances the Passenger Association has compelled single lines to break faith with the public by withdrawing special rates after they had been advertised.

One and one-third fare is the best now in sight for the trip, which can be had from large cities if purchasers ask ticket agent for certificate that will be endorsed by the secretary of the convention. Rates from Chicago to Boston, one way, nineteen and twenty-two dollars according to the route chosen. Should any number, who will pass through Chicago on the way to the convention wish to form a party here and go by one route, the undersigned will give any assistance in his power to further the play. Send him your name and the route you prefer to travel. In this way the party may, if large enough secure a coach to itself. New England, under Boston's lead, always sends a good-sized delegation to meetings of the N. S. A. It would be a fitting recognition of its action in the past for the West to do likewise this season. Everyone who mentions the matter so agrees, but I find no one who is now expecting to attend the convention. Can arrange for some time at Niagara Falls if desired. Send your name quickly, or not at all, to 4203 Evans avenue, Chicago.

Grove Meeting at Glen Ellyn, Ill.

The Unity Spiritual Society of Wheaton, Illinois, my home, held a very pleasant grove meeting in the beautiful grove at Glen Ellyn, Sunday, August 31. I presume none of the Chicago Spiritualists is aware that there is a beautiful grove and lake at Glen Ellyn, a little over twenty miles from Chicago. In this beautiful grove is a very good auditorium which seats one hundred or more people. If it was seated with chairs it would hold three or more hundred people. I know of no prettier spot anywhere. A beautiful little lake, with plenty of row boats, and a fine grove of several acres, and a mineral spring not far from the auditorium, makes truly an ideal spot for a Sunday meeting, and longer if possible. As Dr. Warne and others said, "Why, I had no idea you had such a beautiful spot all ready for meetings."

Well, we have, and we had a fine meeting on Sunday. There was a good attendance, mostly from Chicago. There was unfortunately a large funeral that took several of our friends away.

The morning was devoted to short speeches by different ones, Dr. Warne, Mr. Herbert Arnold, Mrs. Kingsbury, Mrs. Ella Johnson Bloom and myself. I have conducted a great many meetings in my life, but I never conducted a meeting where there was more of the spirit manifest, and an upliftment, than this meeting. The afternoon was devoted largely to the giving of readings by the different mediums present. They were Mrs. Kayner, Mrs. Bloom, Mrs. Nora E. Hill, and myself. After the readings Dr. Warne gave a short address, and I closed the meeting.

Thus ended one of the most enjoyable days, and all left at a late hour, feeling they had been benefited.

Another season we shall hold more meetings, and have them arranged so they can be fully advertised, and I know many of the Chicago Spiritualists will attend. Our new electric line will give us then fine service, making it possible for all to come. Thanking all who came and those who took part, I am as ever, the friend of all,

G. H. BROOKS.

POVERTY AND CRIME:

The Cure—A Hint to the Opulent.

Poverty and civilization are paradoxical in a measure. Crime may be attributed to ignorance, but ignorance is not the cause per se; for there is less crime among the unenlightened or uncivilized than among their antitheses. Nor is poverty the sole cause of crime; for that, too, exists in greater degree among the aforenamed. It is therefore neither in their primary state, but may be both in the secondary—that is, amidst civilization.

Civilization should stand for prosperity and enlightenment. It does in principle and by contrast as a whole, but there are greater contrasts to the contrary amidst our very civilization than among countries or nations.

It is this contrast which makes crime. Poverty amidst prosperity incites to envy or jealousy and constitutes the tempter. The prosperous are not subject to this temptation and therefore have no reasons to be dishonest or jealous, unless they are so by nature, which is all the more to be deplored—if not condemned.

Of course, there can be no apology offered for crime under any circumstances, but the truth can be told that may have the effect of diminishing it.

We advocate the cure of disease by removing the cause instead of combating the effect. Why not advocate the cure of crime by removing its cause?

If envy or jealousy is the cause, and incited by the seeming paradox which poverty lends to civilization, why not suggest remedies to remove this cause?

As the man with broad ideas and filled with inspiration feels cramped in a narrow community, and suffering to get out into larger fields of operation where he can expand and give vent to his feelings, so the civilized human entity feels the desire to indulge his wants—his higher tastes and needs—and suffers when restricted or ground by poverty.

As the inspired man becomes cynical or sarcastic when suppressed too long, so the man with a mind above the savage becomes discontented finally when refused the comforts he craves. Add disappointments to this, and he becomes embittered with life. Then noting the glaring contrasts between his own utter hopelessness of ever attaining a home of his own and the glittering extravagance of the opulent, he feels a pang that stirs his interior to anything but charity—the exterior expressions of which we denominate envy or jealousy. Shall we condemn or pity him for this?

Anarchism is the extreme of this condition, but that is no remedy for the evil. It is simply a demand for an exchange of something for nothing. It would not benefit the real sufferers, who are anxious and willing to earn their homes if they were given the opportunity.

It is these that constitute the big majority among civilization, and who need aid. The criminals among these are the weaker ones, who could not endure the suffering, became impatient in waiting or gave way to their discontent, thereby falling into intemperance or crime—often both.

Ignorance, too, is to blame, but it is the ignorance of caste, of the higher sensibilities of civilization, of culture, habits, tastes, ambitions and aspirations of the opulent. Remove this ignorance, and reform will be the result.

But how? That is for the opulent themselves to decide. They have the means and the knowledge at their command. Without their aid it cannot be accomplished. A man cannot learn the ways of the rich without sojourning among them or be lifted to their plane through some sort of showing in that direction. The man with a home already manifests a certain dignity and higher sense of feeling. His desire to preserve it makes him an acceptable citizen in the offstart. He senses the need of protection and therein becomes himself a protector. And his incentive in that direction is a protection for the more wealthy and cultured, and an opponent of lawlessness, anarchy and crime.

It is thus not only an act of charity on part of those who are enabled to promote such a condition, but a duty they owe to themselves as a salvatory measure. The more aid they offer towards securing homes for the masses, the more friends they will have and the less crime will exist.

Equal rights is a very fine sentiment to preach to voters, but until every man can sing "Home, Sweet Home" without a sigh, it has no existence as a fact—even though his home be in a tenement, made comfortable and freed from the burden of a rental that is too heavy to carry in comparison to his income or family expense.

Of course, circumstances do not warrant every individual or family a "mansion," but every home-center could be made a "mansion" in accordance with the principles of equal rights as they are promised for the future. And if man shall reap as he sows, perhaps the best way to secure a "mansion" in the next life is for those who have a number of them here, to aid some of their fellow-men, who need one, towards that end. The large property-holders certainly cannot occupy their earth-homes in the future, and it may be a gratification to them to have made some worthy or needy ones happy on this side of the veil.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

CAN THE FUTURE BE FORETOLD?

The recent growth and development of navigation from the port of Boston is a fact of magnitude in municipal progress and is reflected in the life of the city in many ways. Two years ago the Cunard Company added to the Boston service the two palatial steamers, the Saxonia and Ivernia, so fine, so splendidly equipped, that they immediately attracted a new following of passenger traffic. Meantime other lines developed, or established themselves, and now Boston has a direct line of Mediterranean service. These increased facilities suggest the need of wireless telegraphy, as in use in the port of New York, and recently a representative of a wireless telegraph company inspected the ground and prospects for establishing it. At the time of the exposition, in 1893, Chicago was, in some respects, much in advance of Boston as a city. Since that time, and notably within the last five years, the municipal progress has been so rapid and so vast as almost to have transformed it within these few years. The residence region fairly extends to Newton boulevard, to the west of the city, and great apartment hotels are now ready for occupancy in regions where two years ago the land was wholly in forest or field.

The extension of Boston's splendid local transit system has transformed the entire surrounding country. "Greater Boston" is already a fact, and already the Boston of the nineteenth century literature begins to seem mythical and far away.

AGE OF THE SEEING EYE.

In the early years of 1830-40 Mr. Emerson wrote to Mr. Alcott, saying: "But I was created a seeing eye and not a useful hand." It was the age of "seeing eye" and the recording—if not the useful—hand. But the days when people copied into their diaries the letters of their friends and spent the rest of the day commenting on them, or went home and wrote down all the conversation which they had heard, or participated in, at the house of a friend, have quite passed into oblivion. Mr. Alcott in his early period wrote in his diary:

"It is much to have the vision of the seeing eye. Did most men possess this, the useful hand would be empowered with new dexterity also. Emerson sees me, knows me, and, more than all others, helps me—not by noisy praise, not by low appeals to interest and passion, but by turning the eye of others to my stand in reason and the nature of things. Only men of like vision can apprehend and counsel each other. A man whose purpose and act demand but a day or an hour for their completion can do little by way of advising him whose purposes require years for their fulfillment. Only Emerson, of this age, knows me, of all that I have found. Well, every one does not find one man, one very man, though and through. Many are they who live and die alone, known only to their survivors of an after century."

NO TIME FOR MENTAL MIRROR.

At the present time people do not occupy their time to any appreciable extent in meditating as to how well—or how accurately—they are known or recognized. Life is too full to pass it before a mental mirror. Again we find Mr. Alcott writing:

"Mr. Emerson lectured this week on politics—sound doctrines, I thought, in fit phrase. His audience enlarges from week to week. I am glad the people come to hear these discourses, which serve to arouse the noble faculties and adapt the senses to something supersensual and permanent. But they will not understand aright. Better attain but glimpses, however, than remain in sluggish obscurity, sense-ridden and sense-beguiled. They seem to listen to him as marveling children to a riddle-telling elder, anxious to fathom the puzzle that drops from his lips and pleasing their dull wits with his mystic lore. Need enough is there of some statement of the divine order and beauty of things, and especially in this city. All minds seem to be enveloped in the bewildering haze of sensualism.

"Ideas are not; spirit is not; brains and hands move all things. The world is a busy workshop, exchange, or inn; and whosoever plies most dexterously the organs that he hath, whether of brain, hand, or belly, doth manfully his duty, and is an accepted member of the body social. Channing's ethics touch not these functions of the social order; Brownson's reasonings stay not the rabid instincts of the populace; nor Graham's invectives stop the career of intemperance and debauchery, in high places and low. Emerson can scarce do more than please; for vain is the hope of undermining the foundations of men's belief in shows and shapes, while the philosophy of the speaker is itself deemed a beautiful show, and himself a skillful puzzler of men's brains.

"Not on those who hear these lectures will the principles which they announce take abiding effect. Another day, another age, are to espouse and live in harmony and love with them."

RECOGNIZED GREATER FORCES.

Mr. Alcott, however, was not so dreamy and lost in mysticism as not to recognize the greater forces that were in the air. A little later we find him writing:

"The ascendency of a spiritual philosophy in the finer and better minds, and particularly in the youth of our day, is an omen of hope. A silent, gradual, and yet perceptible amendment is taking place, and the final settlement of the new is near and sure. The old order is crumbling away; the new powers with which modern science has changed the civilized world have given fresh impulse to enterprise in our people—opened new and wider fields for their extension. Our social and geographical position affords additional incentives and opportunity for a broader display of the national character.

"The Northern genius is successfully competing with nature, and, no less than the Southern ambition, is adding new territories to the already overgrown republic. This great secular interest, thus called into vigorous existence, and furnished with new facilities by its broader field of action, is coming in conflict with existing social and political institutions, and arraying the extreme sections of the country against each other. The struggle has begun. The base and wicked alliance between freedom and slavery—the source of national discord—must issue soon in the dissolution of the present political confederacy. * * *

"The change in the business of men is no less remarkable than in their thinking; the magnetic and steam couriers match the intuitive philosophy and religion. Man is constructing organs for the mind; the dynamic forces of his being are forging facile engines, alike of ponderous metal and the subtilest fluid. Flame, lightning, intuition, enthusiasm are become his readiest porters and runners. 'Feed me,' cries Body, querulously, 'and I'll feed thee.' 'Nay,' quoth the Soul, 'thou canst give me no bread; thou canst not even grow bread for thyself. 'Tis of my good pleasure that thou art; by me are formed all thine organs. I feed thy heart with pity, thy mind with science, thy hand with art, and sustain thee in comfort all thy life long, in this little mansion, and the world to which I am a party in making it for thee. But a worlding and hireling art thou, ever discontented with thy fodder and wages.'

"Noblest of benefactors is the thinking soul; all men, in some sort and time, are beggars, and receive its alms."

VALUE OF THE PRESENT AGE.

It has been a fashion to lament over the past, and to ask with ill-concealed scorn what the latter-day life could offer to compare with the life of that golden age of genius in the middle years of the past century when that wonderful galaxy—Emerson, Longfellow, Dr. Holmes, Lowell, and Whipple were in their prime? One does not need to depreciate the intellectual brilliancy of those days in order to recognize the value of the present.

The great activities, the intense energy, the splendid breadth of life at the present are in a degree the evolutionary results of the noble thought and great aspirations of a half century ago. These are taking form in action and achievement.

FORETELLING THE FUTURE.

Not content with the problem play of "Monna Vanna," Maurice Maeterlinck has propounded in the Fortnightly for August another enigma in adding his questioning to that already in the air as to the scientific possibilities of foretelling the future. We shall probably soon have a bureau of the future, as we now have a weather bureau. Whether it will vie with the latter institution in accuracy remains to be seen. We find Mr. Maeterlinck saying:

"One would say that man had always the feeling that a mere infirmity of his mind separates him from the future. He knows it to be there, living, actual, perfect, behind a kind of wall, around which he has never ceased to turn since the first days of his coming on this earth. Or rather, he feels it within himself and known to a part of himself; only, that important and disquieting knowledge is unable to travel, through the too narrow channels of his senses, to his consciousness, which is the only place where knowledge acquires a name and a useful strength, and, so to speak, the freedom of the human city. It is only by glimmers, by casual and passing infiltrations that future years, of which he is full, of which the imperious realities surround him on every hand, penetrate to his brain. He marvels that an extraordinary accident should have closed almost hermetically to the future that brain which plunges into it entirely, even as a sealed vessel plunges, without mixing with it, into the depths of a monstrous sea that overwhelms it, entreats it, tenses it, and caresses it with a thousand billows."

TIME AND SPACE.

Now the philosophers have taught that time and space are the two dimensions which differentiate the physical and the spiritual worlds; the higher the degree of spiritual development and advancement, the less is the individual limited and hampered and fettered by these two conditions. One may get a certain analogy on it by realizing to how much greater extent the infant or the child is bound by the conditions of space and time than is the man or the woman.

To the child the idea of the next year is, practically, an eternity; while the man calmly and confidently makes his plans for the next year, or for five years or ten years later, with a matter-of-course assurance. The next year to the man is not so remote as the next day is to the child. So by this analogy it is not difficult to realize that when one is released from the physical world and advances into the realm of the subtle and potent forces of the ethereal world, with his faculties responsive to the larger environment—it is not difficult to realize that he is increasingly free from these conditions that are so strong in their power of limitation over the moral life.

"It is," says Maurice Maeterlinck, "quite incomprehensible that we should not know the future. Probably a mere nothing, the displacement of a cerebral lobe, the resetting of Broca's convolution in a different manner, the addition of a slender network of nerves to those which form our consciousness, any one of these would be enough to make the future unfold itself before us with the same clearness, the same majestic amplitude as that with which the past is displayed on the horizon, not only of our individual life, but also of the life of the species to which we belong.

"A singular infirmity, a curious limitation of our intellect, causes us not to know what is going to happen to us, when we are fully aware of what has befallen us. From the absolute point of view to which our imagination succeeds in rising, although it cannot live there, there is no reason why we should not see that which does not yet exist in its relation to us must necessarily have its being already, and manifest itself somewhere. If not it would have to be said that, where time is concerned, we form the center of the world, that we are the only witnesses for whom events wait so that they may have the right to appear and to count in the eternal history of causes and effects. It would be as absurd to assert this for time as it would be for space, that other not quite so incomprehensible form of the twofold infinite mystery in which our whole life floats."

The latest progress in this new century is that of overcoming space. It is being overcome; it is almost annihilated. When on the Atlantic Coast we call up the friend in Chicago and speak with him any hour; when we cable across 2,000 miles of water and receive a speedy reply; when wireless telegraphy waits its message through the etheric currents of the air; when the electric motor is about to revolutionize all our preconceived ideas of distance and journeyings—we see how space is being dominated and is no longer to be one of the conditions that limit man's activities. To a degree overcoming space is also overcoming time. In an essay of Emerson's, written somewhere in the middle of the nineteenth century, he speaks of something as being worth "going fifty miles to see." Fifty miles at that time represented a greater space than 3,000 miles represents at the present. Regarding the condition of space Maeterlinck further says:

"Space is more familiar to us, because the accidents of our organism place us more directly in relation with it and make it more concrete. We can move in it pretty freely; in a certain number of directions before and behind us. That is why no traveler would take it into his head to maintain that the towns which he has not yet visited will become real only at the moment when he sets his foot within their walls. Yet this is very nearly what we do when we persuade ourselves that an event which has not yet happened does not yet exist."

THEORY OF TWOFOLD LIFE.

This brings us to the very point touched some months ago in this series of papers. The only explanation of certain phases of the phenomena of life is in the theory that life is twofold. That what we call life—in the sense of experiences and events and circumstances—is simply the result, the precipitation into the physical world, of the events and experiences that have already occurred to us on the spiritual side of life, and that they occur here because they have occurred there. Maeterlinck says further (in his paper, entitled "The Foretelling of the Future," in the Fortnightly for August): "But I do not intend, in the wake of so many others, to lose myself in the most insoluble of enigmas. Let us say no more about it, except this alone, that time is a mystery which we have arbitrarily divided into a past and a future, in order to try and understand something of it. In itself, it is almost certain that it is but an immense, eternal, motionless Present, in which all that takes place and all that will take place takes place immutably, in which To-morrow, save in the ephemeral mind of man, is indistinguishable from Yesterday or To-day."

The question is raised by Mr. Maeterlinck as to whether the clairvoyant who foretells to one future events gets his knowledge from the subliminal consciousness of the person himself?

He relates a series of experiences that he had in Paris with all sorts and degrees of the professed seers, and he says:

"It is very astonishing that others can thus penetrate into the last refuge of our being, and there, better than ourselves, read thoughts and sentiments at times forgotten or rejected, but always long-lived, or as yet unformulated. It is really disconcerting that a stranger should see further than ourselves into our own hearts. That sheds a singular light on the nature of our inner lives. It is vain for us to keep watch upon ourselves, to shut ourselves up with ourselves; our consciousness is not water-tight, it escapes; it does not belong to us, and though it requires special circumstances for another to install himself there and take possession of it, nevertheless it is certain that, in normal life, our spiritual tribunal, our for interieur—as the French have called it, with that profound intuition which we often discover in the etymology of words—is a kind of forum, or spiritual market place, in which the majority of those who have business there come and go at will, look about them and pick out the truths, in a very different fashion and much more freely than we would have to this day believed."

Mr. Maeterlinck reiterates that it is incredible that we should not know the future. The truth is that it is even more than incredible, it is unpardonably stupid, and the great desideratum is to so develop and unfold the spiritual faculties that they will realize the experiences on the spiritual side—those which will, later on, precipitate themselves into the mortal life, and that will be "knowing the future." That is to say, if we can read our spiritual past, we then know our earthly future, for that which has been, in the inner experience, shall be, in the outer experience.

REALITIES AND ILLUSION.

Mr. Maeterlinck says: "I cannot think that we are not qualified to know beforehand the disturbances of the elements, the destiny of the planets, of the earth, of empires, peoples, and races. All this does not touch us directly, and we know it in the past thanks only to the artifices of history. But that which regards us, that which is within our reach, that which is to unfold itself within the little sphere of years, a secretion of our spiritual organism, that envelops us in time, even as the shell or the cocoon envelops the mollusc or the insect in space; that, together with all the external events relating to it, is probably recorded in that sphere. In any case, it would be much more natural that it were so recorded than comprehensible that it be not. There we have realities struggling with an illusion; and there is nothing to prevent us from believing that here as elsewhere, realities are what will happen to us, having already happened in the history that overhangs our own, the motionless and superhuman history of the universe. Illusion is the opaque veil woven with the ephemeral threads called yesterday, to-day and to-morrow, which we embroider on those realities. But it is not indispensible that our existence should continue the eternal dupe of that illusion. We may even ask ourselves whether our extraordinary unfitness for knowing a thing so simple, so incontestable, so perfect, and so necessary as the future, would not form one of the greatest subjects for astonishment to an inhabitant of another star who should visit us.

"Moreover, we must not believe that the march of events would be completely upset if we knew it beforehand. First, only they would know the future, or a part of the future, who would take the trouble to learn it; even as only they know the past, or a part of their own present, who have the courage and the intelligence to examine it. We should quickly accommodate ourselves to the lessons of this new science, even as we have accommodated ourselves to those of history. We should make allowance for the evils which we cannot escape and for inevitable evils. The wiser among us, for themselves, would lessen the sum total of the latter; and the others would meet them half-way, even as now they go to meet many certain disasters which are easily foretold. The amount of our vexations would be somewhat decreased, but less than we hope; for already our reason is able to foresee a portion of our future, if not with the material evidence that we dream of, at least with a moral certainty that is often satisfying; yet we observe that the majority of men derive hardly any profit from this easy foreknowledge. Such men would neglect the counsels of the future, even as they hear, without following it, the advice of the past."

HOW SOOTHSAYERS FAILED.

Not to know the future is extremely inconvenient, to say the least, and it may present itself as the next most-needed advance in progress. Mr. W. G. Wells initiated this problem as to whether man can forecast the future in a lecture in London last winter. The question is in the air; the demand for its solution will increase, and demands penetrate the unknown and reconstruct it for the higher use of men.

The astrologers claim to forecast the future, but their predictions result only in some degree of relation and similarity at the best, and in total want of relation at the worst. For instance, a prominent minister, whose name would be recognized, were it given, was assured by an astrologer, two years ago, that his wife would die in the July of 1902. The date has passed and the lady has not even been ill. A gentleman of my acquaintance was told by two or three different astrologers and clairvoyants that he would die during the summer of 1901, or at least before 1902. At the time he was perfectly well, but later on he went abroad, was taken very ill in England, and for some weeks he lay critically ill in a hospital in Oxford, but he recovered.

The prophecies regarding the coronation of King Edward have been much discussed; but, after all, he was crowned. On the other hand, there are predictions of this order that are, approximately, at least, fulfilled. Two or three years ago a well-known Boston woman was told by an astrologer in December that her husband would die before June, and many details of his illness were given, which were actually fulfilled in February, when he died, after a brief and totally unexpected illness. Was this a coincidence? Who can tell. But that the power of the will can prevail over any tendencies and dominate them is absolutely true, and will and prayer certainly constitute the motor forces of life.

There is, perhaps, no adequate realization on the part of humanity of the enormous extent to which the forces in the Unseen mingle with the forces of the Seen, and thus complete the magnetic battery of action. Life approaches perfection in just the degree to which it can intelligently and reverently avail itself of this aid which is a divine provision. It is not only after death that the soul is to be with God. The soul that does not live with God, now and here, in the ordinary daily life, does not even live at all, in any true sense. "I am come that ye might have life," said Jesus, "and have it more abundantly." It is only as one holds himself receptive to the divine currents that he has life, and it rests with himself to have it "more abundantly" every day and hour.

This constant communion with Jesus, this living in constant receptivity to the divine energy, includes, too, the living in telepathic communion with those who have gone on into the Unseen world. The spirituality of life is conditioned on so developing our own spiritual powers by faith and prayer and communion with God that one is sensitive to the presence and responsive to the thought of friends who have been released from the physical life. Shall Phillips Brooks, the friend and helper and wise counsilor when here, be less so now that he has entered into the next higher scale of being? Shall the friend whom we loved, and who was at our side in visible presence yesterday, be less our friend to-day because his presence is not visible to us? And why is it not visible? Simply because the subtle spirit-body is in a state of far higher vibration than the denser physical body, and the physical eye can only recognize objects up to a certain vibratory degree. It is simply a scientific fact. Musicians and scientists know well that above a certain pitch the ear cannot recognize sound; it becomes silence. But as St. Paul says, "there is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body," and the spiritual body has its finer organs of sight and hearing. Clairvoyance and clairaudience are as natural, when the spiritual faculties are sufficiently developed, as are the ordinary sight and hearing. Even when there is no clairvoyance and clairaudience, in the way of supernormal development, the mind kept in harmonious receptivity to the divine world may be telepathically in more or less constant communion with those in the Unseen.—Lilian Whiting in the Inter Ocean.

Delphos Camp, Kans.

The camp at Delphos, Kans., closed Aug. 25. Wet! oh, so wet! was the universal cry. This has been the poorest season in the record of this camp so far as regards the weather. Two wet Sundays and eight rainy nights out of 17 days was very trying. Still, with all the clouds many bright lights flashed. Our speakers, Judge H. H. Benson, Judge E. E. Chesney and Rev. Bledsoe all gave us fine thoughts and presented by the oratorical skill of these masters it was most convincing.

Dr. Louis Schlesinger closed this the 5th year with our camp with his best work having many scalps of the skeptics tied to his spiritual belt.

Mrs. Lillian Snow was with us the entire camp and by her kindly manner and her good work added to the list of her former friends many new ones.

In the election of officers, Mr. Clarence Ballow was chosen president; J. N. Reeves, vice-president; H. D. Dwight, secretary; James Morgan, treasurer.

The society under the impetus of the new blood at the helm is bound to be progressive and all are looking forward to a happy and prosperous future.

H. D. DWIGHT.

MOTHERLESS.

One by one the long dark shadows
Take some form upon the wall;
Dimly burns the cheerless fire,
Hushed as death the ashes fall.
A lonely child calls for her mother;
Sorrow bows her little head
As the falling embers answer,
Little girl, your mother's dead.

Never will her mamma listen
To her footsteps through the hall;
Never will she hide in closets
When she hears her mamma call.
Who will tell her little stories,
Who will sing her little songs,
Who will kiss away her pouting,
As she folds her in her arms?

Her little heart is beating wildly,
Burdened not with childish care,
But with grief which has no ending
'Cept in heaven, only there.
Motherless child, God help her now;
Strange the world seems to her,
But her mother hovers o'er her
And will guide her safely through.

Darker grows the ghostly shadows
Formless now upon the wall,
Round the house the night winds whisper
Softly, yet the ashes fall.
How the little sad face brightens,
Bright as if with heavenly beaming,
Sleeping while her darling mother
Soothes her sorrow in her dreaming.

Maple Dell Camp, O.

The National Spiritual and Religious Association closed their fourteenth session August 31, 1902.

The camp has been an unusually successful one; harmony prevailed throughout the entire session.

The excursions from Cleveland were well patronized. Many visited the camp who had never previously been on the grounds. The hotel was managed by a committee of ladies, Mrs. Davis, Mrs. Brown and Mrs. King, who deserve the highest praise for their skill. The literary work, including the school department, was in charge of D. M. King and M. C. Danforth, the latter acting as chairman, supported by a corps of young speakers and mediums. Maple Dell has already become the Young People's Camp, and its future success is now in their hands. The many visitors who contributed to the instructions and entertainments will please accept the sincere thanks of the managers.

Our socials and dances were well attended by refined and cultured people. We have never yet had any use for detectives or policemen, as it has been our aim from the beginning of our camp work to make it strictly moral and spiritual. The union mass meeting held on the last two days of camp was a surprise to many.

The Ohio Spiritualists Association was represented by Albert W. Wadsworth, of Cleveland, and Mrs. Carrie F. Curran, of Toledo. They expressed their views regarding the necessity of a State and National Association. The call of this joint meeting was made for the following purpose:

To bring the Spiritualists of Ohio nearer into line with each other, to harmonize the various societies and bring them into unity of purpose, thus forming a fraternity of Spiritualists.

To elevate the standard of our spiritual work upon a higher plane.

To agree upon a declaration of principles, that the people may know what pure Spiritualism is.

To hold inviolate the sacredness of mediumship, so as to secure the best results thereby, and to discuss any subject that would tend toward elevating the human race. All agreed that something of this kind ought to be brought about, and yet no one was wise enough to devise a plan upon which all could agree to work.

The Ohio State representatives objected on the second motion of having a committee on declaration of principles, while this clause in the call was of the most importance to us. After some discussion the motion was withdrawn and dropped. The motion prevailed for a committee on organization, which resulted in a proposition from the Ohio Spiritualists' Association simply to rent Maple Dell Park for two years, that they might demonstrate what could be done by them. This report was brought before the meeting by Mr. Wadsworth on Sunday afternoon, read and re-read so as to make it plain to all. This proposition did not receive a very strong support from the members of the National Spiritual and Religious Association.

Another surprise came to the members and friends of Maple Dell on this last day of camp. The board of trustees held a meeting which resulted in securing pledges from those who are interested in our camp work to the extent as to enable the board to pay all indebtedness and bring the Camp Association into a more practical working condition.

The National Spiritual and Religious Association was incorporated in 1890, under the laws of Ohio, and not for profit, but for intellectual, scientific, ethical, spiritual and religious or educational culture, with power to organize and establish auxiliary or branch associations in other counties in the State of Ohio, and in other States by complying with the laws thereof.

And as new forces are now coming to our assistance and a brighter and more favorable outlook is in sight, we propose to carry out the purposes for which this organization was formed. Therefore all persons holding stock, also all who have received certificates of ordination from the above association, will please report to Lucy King, corresponding secretary, Box 45 Mantua, Ohio.

CONNECTED WORLDS.

A Lady's Interesting and Instructive Experience with the "Psyche" Board.

It was quite a trial of patience for poor Jeanette, to be accused of making fetishes of her son's former belongings, by tenderly touching or kissing this or that souvenir of her only boy, and she revolted against his insinuation to "stop that practice."

However, she actually reduced it to a minimum, feeling that there was after all a grain of truth in Walter's reasoning, though dictated by jealousy, and that she ought to check that motherly weakness of hugging things that once were in contact with her son's material body. Did she not know that this body was itself only a garment of the real man, who now was enjoying that happiness to which all pure and progressive minds aspire during their earthly pilgrimage? Why should she worship what adorned his material body? Still, a mother's love could not interfere with a friend's; did Walter not perceive the difference? Had he never possessed a mother's love? He surely had, for Jeanette knew the family too well to admit any doubt in this direction.

Suspicion kept adding to suspicion. Once Walter endeavored to arouse jealousy in Jeanette by hinting at the fact that some young and beautiful women were trying to ensnare him, but he met a miserable failure, for Jeanette turned from him in disgust, and wondered how the youth she loved so well could have evoluted into such a coxcomb.

Was she herself to blame for it at the bottom? Would he perhaps have become a different man with her as a wife? Human conceit is quick in answering such questions, and we can easily guess Jeanette's answer. Once more her pity came to his aid, making her feel in duty bound to stay by him, such as he was. But was he Walter?

This question was not to be silenced any more, and one day when he furnished new reasons for doubt, she abruptly asked: "Who are you? Speak!"

"Walter B.," came the quick answer.

"Swear to it!"

"I swear."

"Give me some unmistakable proof of your identity! Tell me something you remember, unknown to anybody but yourself and me!"

"Alas," he said after some hesitation," we men do not so well remember certain things as women do. Besides, I have not got my earth-memories with me just now. I am not dead yet, but mostly living on earth, and am only in heaven when in your presence."

At this Jeanette threw the board aside in dismay. The duplicity and silliness of Walter's answer was too much for her, and for a long time she withstood that mysterious, urgent influence drawing her towards the board. That answer had only increased suspicion, and yet who should he be, if not Walter? Who should care to impersonate him in order to court her affection? Only a few German friends, dwelling in adjoining spheres, might remember her friendly relations with Walter, but none of them spoke English, while her correspondent's fluency in both English and German, pointed to a German-American. But she could not think of anybody within the States who might have had the slightest chance while on earth to learn anything of her girlhood days. The knowledge could only have been acquired on the other side, through Walter himself or his nearest kin, and if he was over there, why should he not as well be the correspondent, changed though he be to his disadvantage?

Even that language problem seemed not past solution, viewed in that glimmer of superstition, yet lingering within the stoutest heart of the most pronounced skeptic. Such contemplations allayed Jeanette's suspicions once again and soon communication was reestablished, giving Walter another chance to plead for himself and reclaim possession of Jeanette's pliable heart.

He certainly was a master of persuasion and knew how to captivate the average woman's heart; but Jeanette did not belong to the average, and her affections were not to be separated from her moral consciousness. The glimpses she caught of frivolity, in spite of Walter's carefulness, acted like a blight on her feelings and she longed for an end of doubt and struggle. He evidently sensed it and conceived a plan to secure her possession for good. Was this within the limits of a spirit's possibilities? We do not know, we only relate simple facts.

One evening Walter asked Jeanette to hold herself in readiness for a trip to the moon, where his parents resided and had everything in readiness for their reception. He would come to take her during the night and would accept no excuse.

Jeanette felt somewhat bewildered, but she had heard of mediums making excursions to other worlds during trance, and concluded that this might be the meaning of Walter's mysterious proposition.

That night while preparing for retiring, being in a highly sensitive state and a prey to exalted expectations, she suddenly heard an interior voice, purporting to come from her grandmother, warning her in the most impressive terms not to fall asleep that night and neither to think of Walter, this being the only means to keep him at a distance. She explained that he had criminal intentions towards her, wanting to make sure of her at once by an elopement from earth, thus dragging her down to his own level and marring her future progress. She promised to watch over her that night and help in keeping him away and send him to the lower sphere where he belonged.

This was indeed startling news for poor, unsuspecting Jeanette. She fought a hard fight against sleep that night and even some consecutive nights, until she was told by her son that the danger was over, and the original criminal sent off to his proper place. He cautioned her, however, to keep her mind away from Walter, which was the hardest thing for her to do; for try as she might, the impressions came on persistently though she summoned energy enough to keep them down. Her worn-out nerves had scarcely rested a few days, when a half-forgotten old friend greeted her through the board, congratulating her about her narrow escape from disastrous courtship, and trying to advance claims of his own.

He had been a respectable man on earth, much older than Jeanette, and a fine scholar. She highly appreciated his literary attainments, and their correspondence, carried on for several years, had been a mint of valuable information for the eager young girl who accepted with sincere gratitude the fatherly care bestowed by him on her intellectual development. It never dawned on her that a total affinity between man and woman might occasionally turn into love, pure and simple, and she felt thoroughly startled at his rather strange behavior one day—only once—and then he seemed to regain his self-command, never to betray himself again. Now he approached once more, an advanced denizen of a higher world, and she could not help feeling gratified and honored, so much the more as her latest experience had humbled her very much in spite of a clean conscience. But Jeanette would not bind herself by promise, as long as earthly ties were binding her to Randolph, and Hermann willingly consented to await his chances in the next sphere.

The following days brought her messages from Hermann, mostly of a literary character, spiced with philosophical remarks and adorned with poetry, some of it being reminiscences of verses he had devoted to her while on earth. There were also letters from Fred and Grandmother, deprecating Walter's wild nature, and speaking of his having been chased into the lower sphere whence he made escapades into the higher one, roaming through space in utmost despair. Jeanette's heart felt touched at such news, but she concluded that he was indeed too much below her, and must be forgotten.

Meanwhile, some dear friends of long ago had found the avenue of the board, and by their communications she learned that Elma, one of her sweetest women friends, who had arrived but recently, was instantly betrothed to Hermann, who had loved her on earth secretly for many years. Poor man! his bad luck with womenkind was proverbial among his friends on earth, and followed him even across the border.

Scarcely was he betrothed to gentle Elma, when her bridegroom on earth who had deserted her for mercenary reasons, approached the realms where money does not count. Elma's forgiving soul was in raptures. She deserted Hermann, claiming her lover once more, and soon they went to housekeeping "on the moon." This was the time when Hermann approached Jeanette. Time, by the way, seems a different conception in yonder worlds from what it is here. That which might occupy months according to our idea of time, seems there crowded into a few days. So Jeanette had no sooner learned about Elma's housekeeping on the moon, when there were rumors of the couple not getting along well together, of the possibility of a new separation and Elma's return to Hermann. With singular magnanimity Jeanette gave up all claim on Hermann's future affection in spirit land, urging Elma to come back to Hermann, and giving the best advice she could afford. In fact, the reunion was perfected in almost no time.

At this juncture, there came to Jeanette one day a correspondent claiming to be Fred, and impersonating her dear boy pretty well until he said something that gave the lie to his claim. Immediately there followed these words: "It is Walter again, indeed!"

"Yes, it is I! Now I have caught up connection once more, and nothing will drive me away! I have suffered enough. I have undergone all the penance I can stand, and here I am, claiming your forgiveness. I watched my opportunity to face God, and on my knees obtained His pardon. He could not refuse me, considering that I erred by an excess of love. You must forgive after He has forgiven. You love me and there is no escape. Our names are written in the stars, side by side, and we belong together in all eternity."

There was no arguing with him about the characteristics of spiritual and material love; about the sanctity of marriage bonds, and the unnatural aspect of any but purely spiritual connections between inhabitants of different spheres. A purely spiritual bond would not satisfy Walter, and he maintained that the laws of the next sphere were all in his favor; that Jeanette was now his undisputed bride, though bound to Randolph, only he must not try again to shorten her earth life, pledged as he was by a solemn promise.

Fred and the rest of the family endorsed his claim of having been forgiven by God, saying that they must do the same, however reluctantly, and it was the only course for her to take after all, she being destined to help Walter out of the moral mire he had slipped into, mostly by the fault of that bad wife of his whom he had never loved.

Poor bewildered Jeanette! She saw no end of struggle between love and duty; between warm impulse and repugnance based on her love of absolute truth. Where was this truth? Oh, for a superior guiding hand! Oh, for one unmistakable glimpse into the unknown! "God had forgiven him;" so had she, but what about his assertion of having seen God face to face? She could not conceive of a God made after the pattern of man; it seemed foolish to her—nay, blasphemous! Her conception of the life-spring of countless glorious universes was too broad and exalted to admit of such a puny God; and yet was there any proof against similar assertions? Was man anyhow destined to sound the ocean of infinity? She had found one principal truth, that of individual immortality, and possible intercourse between worlds, and thought she should feel satisfied, yet she craved more light, more truth.

Walter's company had become to her a source of doubt and distress, marring that peace and satisfaction that his reappearance would have given her, had he come back to her loving and forgiving, with all the characteristics of his former self, enhanced by the purifying and exalting influence of a life in a higher sphere. As it was, she almost wished he had kept aloof and spared her all this doubt and distraction; yet, could she repulse him if it were indeed he himself?

This trend of ideas remained no secret to Walter; in fact, Jeanette's mind seemed literally an open book to him, even items inscribed in its remotest corners, forgotten by herself, were mentioned by him, constantly startling and mystifying her, as she was still too green in occult knowledge to account for such phenomena by higher laws of nature.

Walter evidently profited by these laws, without developing at the same time in moral and ethical directions. He also freely acknowledged his shortcomings, maintaining that, love being his ruling power, he was to be excused in other lines. To counteract Jeanette's doubts and scruples and to arrest the cooling of her affections, was now the principal aim he pursued. Meanwhile he discussed freely the "scheme" in which he was thwarted, and resented Jeanette's faint suspicion as to his power of carrying out such a monstrous plan, even if it were legitimate.

He stoutly claimed that similar things had happened numbers of times, the doctors pronouncing such cases simply "heart failure." Again Jeanette felt repulsed; this time by his frivolity displayed in talking of such grave matters, shortly after his apparent repentance and consecutive absolution. And when his clamor for new favors grew more and more passionate, and he tried again to approach her by those inexplicable electrifying kisses already referred to, she resolutely threw off the influence by discarding the board.

When a few weeks later she was drawn to it again, there again came a message in her son's name, reproaching her with lack of charity; saying that Walter was to be pitied rather than scorned; that he was a poor sufferer, being deranged in his mind for many years and was longing for his impending dissolution which would free him from all that was repulsive to her, and fully restore his former individuality. What appeared to her deception and falsehood was nothing but the dreams of a wandering mind; just now, he having some lucid moments, his memory suggested some facts that would prove his identity, and so he begged him to be introduced to his mother. Of course, Jeanette was eager for such a proof, and gladly received him. She forthwith asked him a question uppermost in her mind for a long time; it was this:

"Where did we meet the last time on earth?"

"We met at my mother's coffin."

"Ah, yes; I never forgot that sad, silent, solemn meeting, but it was not our last one, after all."

"No, we met once more at the house of S——, in the small city of Sch——."

"True, but we did not speak, and there were many friends; one of them, your special friend, has left earth before you."

"You mean K.; he is here asking for a talk; he will corroborate some of my statements."

So friend K. was introduced, and sure enough verified all of Walter's assertions, emphasizing especially poor Walter's suffering, his ravings while in the straight-jacket; his heavenly excursions and meetings with Jeanette; stories that were accounted for by his attendants as the well-known vagaries of a disturbed mind. He also named the asylum where Walter was confined, and gave the address of his brother T——, advising Jeanette to write to him for further news and corroboration. Moreover, he claimed to be united to Gertrude, sister of Jeanette's most intimate friend, Emma H.

Here Walter interrupted the prolonged conversation with some jealous remarks and seemed impatient to be left alone with Jeanette. Could she refuse to receive him now on the former footing, after such overwhelming testimony, and his protestations of aspiring to pure angelhood as soon as he could get rid of his miserable body?

It was an easy matter always unfortunately, for even perfect strangers to enlist Jeanette's sympathies; so the old relations were at last re-established, and even those mysterious kisses granted again. Walter claiming that it greatly helped in loosening his soul from the worn-out, but tenacious body, Jeanette thus constituted herself as his deliverer.

It seemed a hopeless task, and she fervently hoped to accomplish it and live to see the day when Walter would approach her on the wings of a delivered soul, free from the shackles of earthly matter, and communicating with her on a purely spiritual plane.

(To be concluded.)

Erroneous Charges.

It is many times charged by church people, and perhaps others, that Spiritualism tends to immorality; that women cease to be virtuous and men become libertines after embracing Spiritualism. It is more than intimated that they are then ready to indulge in the vices of the world without restraint.

This very uncharitable and unjust charge has, time and again, been denied and refuted, but still many are found who seem to derive a pleasure in believing and speaking evil of those who may be chaste and pure.

Why should it be thought that Spiritualists should more readily indulge in immorality than others? Does their religion allow them any greater freedom to do wrong than that of the churches? No, indeed. Spiritualists believe and teach that each individual will be "judged according to the deeds done in the body, whether they be good or whether they be evil;" that "as we sow so shall we also reap." Each will have to atone for every sin—every evil thought, in fact. They do not believe, as Christians do, that some one else will bear the burden of sin and error committed through life, but they expect to have to answer in person for each and every indiscretion. Therefore there can be no reason why they should indulge in vicious or sinful acts.

On the contrary the orthodox believers can, and doubtless many do, seek the pleasures of the world expecting to lay all "at the foot of the cross" in due time and have their vile hearts regenerated and go to heaven. The Spiritualist cannot do this; he expects nobody to answer for his sins.

A Prophetic Jewel.

To the students of occult and spiritualistic phenomena, and particularly to those who are interested in crystal-gazing, the following clipping may prove of interest:

"Marquise du Barry, whose lovely head fell into the basket beneath the guillotine in expiation of her levity, extravagance and folly, had in her possession a stone of which the Paris jewelers were unable to tell the precise nature.

"There appeared upon it below the surface and as if under water an outline of a picture containing human figures. Strange to relate, when first the gem was given to its afterward unfortunate possessor this outline was not clear, but after it had been some months in her possession it grew more vivid.

"One day the negro boy, Lamor, who was afterward instrumental, from revenge, in the downfall of the Du Barry, declared, looking at the jewel, that he could decipher the figure of a woman with disheveled hair leaning before a scaffold and surrounded by a crowd, while beside her stood the executioner.

"A strange but authenticated circumstance is that the negro servant boy precisely described the guillotine. Dr. Guillotine had not then invented his celebrated instrument of death, nor had the horrors of the revolution begun.

"Snatching the jewel from the hand of the servant, Mme. Du Barry examined it, saw the kneeling woman, the angry crowd, the death knife falling, and, with a cry of agony, fell senseless to the floor." LEWIS R. HILLIER.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

THE FOREIGN FIELD—SPIRIT PORTRAIT—THE PRINCESS KARADJA.

In the May number of the Revue des Etudes Psychiques appears a portrait and a memoir of this celebrated medium, as also a fac-simile of two of her drawings, made under spirit influence. One of these is a complex design of a geometrical character, which experienced architects declare would be impossible of accomplishment for a skillful hand without a rule and compass; while the other is a portrait, which was immediately recognized as that of his deceased wife, by Mr. George Larsen, of Copenhagen. This was obtained by the Princess under the following remarkable circumstances:

"On the death of his wife, Mr. Larsen's grief was insupportable, and all the more so, because, up to that time, he had been a materialist. But, reading a pamphlet by the Princess Karadja, entitled 'Spirit Phenomena,' he wrote to her. 'On the evening in which I received the letter,' writes the Princess, 'we had a sitting at my house, when my husband manifested himself, and I asked him if he could find Mrs. Larsen. Much to my surprise, he told me that she was present, that she had inspired her husband to write to me, and that she wished him to come here. I made this known to Mr. Larsen, who, without losing any time in writing to me, set out at once for Stockholm.'

"Since last winter I have received the gift of making mediumistic designs, my specialty being the portraiture of spirits. On the day of Mr. Larson's arrival in Stockholm, I had executed in crayons a very beautiful female head, with so expressive a countenance that it could not be a creation of the fantasy; for one felt instinctively that those winning features must have belonged to a human being. I had scarcely finished the drawing when Mr. Larsen was announced, and some friends arrived for a sitting. Upon seeing the portrait on the table, Mr. Larsen uttered an exclamation of joy and surprise, stating that he recognized it as the portrait of his wife.

"He took a photograph from his pocket, and showed it to me, remarking that the drawing was much more like her, because it recalled her appearance during the latter days of her life, whereas the photograph represented her in good health. He afterwards wrote me that his father-in-law had burst into tears on beholding the drawing.

"Some hundreds of persons in Sweden and Denmark have become believers since the event, for Mr. Larsen was completely unknown to me, and we had not a single mutual friend.

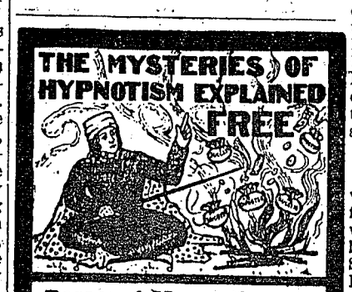
"During the sitting he received some most convincing messages. His wife gave her baptismal name, of which we were all ignorant, and recalled to mind many circumstances of their private life; and she played one of her favorite airs upon the mandolin (the instrument having been touched by invisible fingers). Then she asked Mr. Larsen to go to Copenhagen, mentioning a locality with which we were all acquainted, where he would find a female named Christina, to whom she had done a wrong she wished to repair. Mr. Larsen afterwards found this female at the spot indicated, but had never heard speak of her before. I consider this fact as an excellent proof of the identity of a spirit, because it could not be explained by the theory of the subliminal consciousness, inasmuch as not one of us was aware of the existence of Christina, who was known only to the late Mrs. Larsen."

Mr. George Larsen, finding himself recently at Berlin, wrote from thence to Mr. Hermann Gorouvell, editor of the "Eko" newspaper, a letter descriptive of many sittings, at which the Princess Karadja, the Countess von Moltke, Mrs. Frisk (of Stockholm), Mrs. Abend (the medium), and two relatives of hers were present. He says: "What I believed to be impossible has come to pass at Berlin. In the presence of many witnesses, I have seen my deceased wife. I have seen her four times under conditions which precluded all possibility of fraud, or of hallucination. It appears to be so natural to me now, that I am astonished at my former skepticism."

The Princess Karadja writes to us as follows, on the subject of these sittings: "The witnesses were nine in number, who beheld Mrs. Larsen materialize. Three lamps were burning. We had undressed the medium before the sitting. Each article of apparel, even to her underclothing, had been examined, as well as the room itself. We saw the medium and the spirit side by side, at the same time, in a strong light. The medium is a little woman and very plain. Mrs. Larsen is tall, slight, and admirably beautiful. She showed herself clothed exactly as in my drawing (made a year before), with a tulle veil around her head and shoulders, and a star (five-pointed) above her head. She left three yards of tulle in the hands of her husband. It resembled her bridal veil. It is absolutely impossible that the tulle, without a fold in it, could have been simulated by the medium or in the room."

Mr. Larsen, in concluding his narrative, writes as follows: "I believe now as firmly in the progress of Spiritualism as I believe in the incessant struggle to arrive at the truth. It is doubtful if any limits can be assigned to the human mind. Nature has always some fresh secret to unveil to us. Our horizon is continually expanding. The light is spreading on all questions—life, death, and the infinite. But we must wait."

This gentleman, as we have said, was a materialist, and yet when his wife departed from him, the instinct of immortality was strong in him than his disbelief in an after life. He craved for some assurance of it from the Beyond, and he was fortunate enough to receive it. O si sic omnes!



SPIRITUALISM IN POLAND.

We have to acknowledge the receipt from Warsaw of the first number of the first spiritual journal ever published in Poland. Its title is the "Dziwy Zycia," or "Wonders of Life," and it is edited by Witold Chlopicki, a gentleman who has been a frequent and esteemed contributor to the Spiritualistic publications of other continental countries. It is a handsomely printed paper of sixteenteen pages, small folio; and contains, among other articles, one describing Dr. Richard Hodgson's sittings with Mrs. Piper, in Boston, embellished with portraits of both. In another, an account is given of some of the remarkable phenomena obtained through Mme. d'Esperance, of whom a portrait is given, as also of Hera Arne Garborg. We notice, in another part of the "Dziwy Zycia," the titles of no less than seventeen books on Spiritualism which have been published in the Polish language; ten are translations from the English, French, and German; two are from the editor's own pen, and the rest appear to be the work of Polish authors. There is evidently a demand for this kind of literature in the land of Sobieski, and a request that we would exchange with our new-born contemporary in Warsaw, is a gratifying proof that the Harbinger is known and esteemed even in a country so far distant from us as Russian Poland. We offer our confrere, M. Witold Chlopicki, our hearty congratulations upon the appearance of so promising an accession to the Spiritualistic press of Europe, and our sincere wishes for the prosperity and ever-enlarging usefulness of so promising a periodical.

THE GROWTH OF SPIRITUALISM.

We find in "Il Vessillo Spiritista," of the 1st May last, an important article on "Spiritual Circles," quoted from the "Revista Moderna Politica e Letteraria," which, as its title imports, is a review devoted to literature and politics. It is signed "Achille Tanfani" and is nearly six columns in length. It contains an historical sketch of the rise and growth of Modern Spiritualism, written with remarkable fairness and accuracy; and after examining the facts, and weighing the statements and allegations of our opponents, without overlooking the fraudulent practices which have been exposed in connection with it, Signor Tanfani sums up his conclusions in these words: "Notwithstanding the bad faith and simony of false priests, the true cultivators of Spiritualism are such, and so many, that this consolatory science, based, as it is, upon an indisputable phenomenonology, has followed its ascending parabole, upon which, after such an accumulation of authoritative testimony, one cannot pronounce on a priori grounds, the word impossible, without being guilty of imprudence. It has, I repeat, followed its ascending parabole, until its disciples, scattered over the entire world, are now to be reckoned by tens of millions. Paris contains 40,000, Brussels 30,000. Entire villages in Belgium are peopled by Spiritualists. Agram may be called the city of Spiritualism. In London it is preached from two pulpits. Berlin has become the centre of its most famous thaumaturgists, and more than 40 periodicals in all languages disseminate its doctrine (in reality there are something like 200), in combination with a literature which comprises many thousands of volumes. The immense popularity acquired by the study of the occult sciences in an epoch so skeptical as our own, in which official science is daily diminishing the mass of old prejudices, is perhaps a stranger phenomenon than the transcendental manifestations of Spiritualism. But when it is considered that the human soul in every historical period has always conserved the same fund of sentimentalism, and the same tendency towards the marvelous, this reversion to the cult of hitherto neglected sciences, after long periods of rest and oblivion, will not appear altogether inexplicable. At the same time, such a cult, while not changing its inner essence during the lapse of ages, nevertheless is subject in its external forms to the influence of the epoch in which it re-arises. In those periods at which religious worship prevailed, it was involved in mysticism. In our own, instead, it has taken a scientific direction, readily borrowing from science its methods of research, and even its terminology."

When will the press, both religious and secular, in English-speaking communities which profess to pride themselves on their love of fair play, copy the example of foreign journals while discussing the subject of Spiritualism? Anything more illogical, as well as unjust, than the attitude assumed by Australian newspapers in reference to it, whenever they forget their conspiracy of silence concerning it, it would be difficult to imagine. Frauds and counterfeit phenomena have been detected and exposed in connection with it, and therefore all the phenomena of Spiritualism are deceptions and delusions! This is the stock argument. Why not say, "Cheques and banknotes are being continually forged, therefore all such documents must be regarded and rejected as having been issued by rogues and cheats, and every description of paper money is wholly unworthy of credit, and not to be accepted as currency?"

An Important Discovery.

That distinguished "Literary Detective," as Col. Ingersoll designated our friend Wm. H. Burr, Esq., of Washington, has made one of the most important literary discoveries of the age, and it is a vital blow to Christian assumptions.

The Christian era was first suggested by Dionysius the Little, in the 6th century. It was gradually adopted by the leading churchmen, but, says Kitto, in his "Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature," article "Chronology:"

"The use of the era did not become universal in Christendom until the fifteenth century."

All authorities agree in these statements. Now:

Jerome, also known as Hieronymus, is counted as one of the most voluminous of the early Christian authors. He is reputed to have been born in the year 331, and died September 20, 420. His "Lives of Illustrious Men," it is claimed, was written in the year 392.

Among the numerous productions credited to this scholar was the revision of the old Italia Testament, and the substitution of the Latin Vulgate, from which came our English rendering.

The first reliable knowledge of Jerome's productions appeared at Rome in 1467, in two volumes, and consisted of some of his epistles and small works. Like all the works of the Christian Fathers, it was represented these writings of Jerome were found in an old monastery, as was alleged of Josephus, and of many classical authors. But Jerome grew into mammoth proportions, appearing in Italy, Germany and Gaul, until in 1684, when the Erasmus edition, with notes, had swollen to twelve volumes.

The question arises: Were Jerome's works written prior to the alleged author's death, A. D. 420, or are they fabrications of Benedictine monks in the 15th century, as many learned scholars believe? In Jerome's "Lives of Illustrious Men" occurs this expression:

"And because in the Acts of the Apostles there is a very full description of his [Paul's] conversion, I will only say this, that after the passion of the Lord in the year XXV, that is, in the second of Nero," etc.

This was written some two centuries before Dionysius, or any one else, had proposed noting time from the birth of "our Lord." Prior to that event all Grecian writers noted time by Olympiads; while Roman writers used the era of Rome.

Suppose a writer in the year 1600 had dated an event as occurring in the year XXV of American Independence; would we not have positive evidence that he did not write until after that date had become the property of the world?

As stated, critics have long suspected the writings, professedly of Jerome, are monkish forgeries of the 15th century, and they have presented a long array of facts to demonstrate the truth of their claim. But it remained for our "literary detective" Burr to clinch the evidence, and put an end to argument. He has the floor, and we surrender the further discussion of the subject to his versatile pen.

A Unique Poster.

In the art of devising sensational election posters the French Woman Suffrage League takes first prize in Paris. The picture is a fine production and Parisians stop by the hour together to gaze at it. The subject is, "Man and Woman," both dropping their voting papers into the ballot box, which in France is grandly called the "electoral urn." The latter vessel, quite Greek in form, occupies the center of the picture. To the left stands man, to the right woman. Both extend a hand toward the urn in question and are striking a noble attitude. Woman gazes at man with a look showing her deep sense of responsibility, the reciprocated glance being one of brotherly confidence: Think, citizens and citizenesses, of the day when man and woman shall be brother and sister in the exercise of their common civil rights and go to the ballot box together.

In the Interest of the Home.

Our confidence in the beneficent effect of woman's enfranchisement lies in this: With woman home interests are paramount; with man business interests are paramount; the vices of humanity are not always the foes of business, but they are always the enemies of the home; the vices are often the allies of business, but never the allies of the home; hence we can trust the home in politics much more than we can trust business. The home, the school and the church in politics will never permanently betray the best moral, virtuous, financial interests of humanity. We cannot say as much of business. Business is business; the cash code knows nothing of morals when at the ballot box. Hence woman suffrage can be trusted in all higher political issues.

"Human Culture and Cure. Part First. The Philosophy of Cure. (Including Methods and Instruments." By E. D. Babbitt, M. D., LL. D. A very instructive and valuable work. It should have a wide circulation, as it well fulfills the promise of its title. For sale at this office. Price 75 cents.

Has Stirred Up the Preachers.

President Baer, of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad, has shocked the country with his remarkable letter ascribing the possession of the coal fields by himself and his associates to divine intention.

The letter is in reply to one written by W. F. Clark, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., in which he presented the side of the laborer from a Christian point of view.

Here is the remarkable letter:

Mr. W. F. Clark, Wilkesbarre, Pa.:

My Dear Mr. Clark—I have received your letter of the 16th inst.

I do not know who you are. I see that you are a religious man, but you are evidently biased in favor of the right of the workingman to control a business in which he has no other interest than to secure fair wages for the work he does.

I beg of you not to be discouraged, as the rights and interests of the laboring man will be protected and cared for, not by the labor agitators, but by the Christian men to whom God in his infinite wisdom has given the control of the property interests of the country, and upon the successful management of which so much depends.

Do not be discouraged. Pray earnestly that right may triumph, always remembering that the Lord God Omnipotent still reigns and that his reign is one of law and order, and not of violence and crime. Yours truly.

GEORGE N. BAER, President.

The above was published in the Chicago American, and from the day of its publication, from every side there came a gale of caustic and astonished comments, and the difference seems to be that between the god of gold and the god of muscle; the god of the rich and the god of the poor; the god of the employer and the god of the employe. It looks as if each had a separate god. Mr. Baer evidently believes that his god has helped him to get control of the mines so that they will be properly managed, and is helping him to put up the price of hard coal at the expense of some other people's god, and the laborers who do the work for him are only human machines created by God in his wisdom for the use of a corporation of Christians, but others take issue with Mr. Baer.

Russel Sage says:

"Well, I wouldn't be surprised if President Baer woke up some morning and found that God had given Mr. Morgan the mines and everything else in sight. However, I believe that the mines were designed for the common good of the people, and the manner in which they are worked is of vital importance to the miners."

W. Bourke Cockran made the following strong comment:

"I don't believe that in creating coal mines or other sources of commodities God had in view the bestowal of them upon the present owners. I believe that all natural products were created by God for the benefit of the whole human race. As coal, like all commodities, must be produced before it is distributed, whoever wantonly or unnecessarily causes the production to be suspended or restricted is an enemy to God and man. The laborers are, of course, interested in the proper working of the mines by those who have charge of them."

Father Curran, of Wilkesbarre, in writing of Mr. Baer's so-called divine right of controlling property interests, says:

"If Mr. Baer claims the divine right (God bless the mark) of ruling his property, he must concede the divine right of the miners in working that property. By way of generalities I would say this: That the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. He creates it for man's use and benefit. Now, if a handful of American millionaires assume divine right to the Lord's earth, where do the people come in? There should be no more nonsense about the labor difficulties in this coal region."

The Vedanta says there is no God but man. The living God is within you, and in this instance it looks like the Hindu religion predominates.

Poor God; he is called all-wise, omnipotent, omniscent, omnipresent etc., and still he is both on the side of wrong and right. He placed the coal in the ground for the benefit of the people and placed a guard at the mine to prevent the people from getting it. He is on the side of the coal famine and the ones who produce it. He is on the side of the poorly paid miners who risk their lives in the earth to get the coal for the world, and on the side of the men who are made rich even by the present strike.

Oh, what a God! When will men's brains lead them into the light of a higher knowledge of the affairs of life with which they have to deal? Selfishness is a human god. Ambition to possess and control is a human god. Gold is a human god. When truth, love and sympathy become gods there will be no strikes and no tyranny, no ownership of man by man, and man will be led to study self more, and his future possibilities along with the present.

The Chronicle, of this city, has the following, in part, to say of the matter:

"No doubt Mr. Baer and many other men of his class sincerely believe they are upright Christians and benevolent philanthropists. They do not indulge in introspection. They are surrounded by people who never tell them the truth. They hear, day in and day out, that they are great, noble and upright men. As it is the weakness of humanity to accept as true all the pleasant and agreeable things that are said about it, they finally settle down to the conviction that they are really what their flatterers picture them. No one undeceives them. The hope for them lies in the possibility that someone may happen along who will wake them up."

The Times-Herald comments upon this little note thus:

"One would have to be well acquainted with Mr. Baer to know whether this message were the cant of a conscious hypocrite or merely the symptom of a stupefying attack of self-righteousness, but in either case it is a string of false ideas and false sentiment.

"If the blasphemous reference to the Deity had the significance which the writer imputes to it then not only the pious Baer but every successful Croesus would be among the Lord's anointed, no matter how unscrupulous his methods and depraved his morals.

"The reference to law and order is equally unfortunate. Mr. Baer is an active member of one of the most persistent and offensive law-breaking organizations in the country. By its very existence it breaks the laws of the State of Pennsylvania and of the United States. Though the disorderly striker should be suppressed, what is his influence toward anarchy compared with that of the plutocrat, who is an anarchist by divine right?

"Perhaps the most amazing thing about the message is the insensibility it reveals to the industrial and political movement of the time. Self-righteousness is common among all classes, the obstinacy of Mr. Baer is peculiar to a few extreme individualists of the let things alone school. All the rest of the world knows that such property interests as this man's are laden with public obligations, whose fulfillment is not a matter of his will but of the public's. His message will merely intensify the demand for the public control of monopolies."

Here is the way they dispose of all the Baers in Hindu sacred lore, as explained in the Chicago American by F. S. G.:

Such men as Baer and his brother coal owners are thus spoken of in that part of the Hindu sacred lore called the Bhagavad Gita, which is said by some literary critics to be the most sublime scriptural production known:

"Held in bondage by a hundred ties of expectation, given over to lust and anger, they strive to obtain by unlawful means hoards of wealth for sensual enjoyment.

"'This to-day by me hath been won, that purpose I shall gain; this wealth is mine already, and also this shall be mine in future.

"'I have slain this enemy and others also shall I slay. I am the Lord, I am the enjoyer, I am perfect, powerful, happy.

"'I am wealthy, well born; what other is there like unto me? I will sacrifice, I will give alms, I will rejoice.' Thus deluded by unwisdom.

"Bewildered by numerous thoughts, enmeshed in the web of delusion, addicted to the gratification of desire, they fall downward into a foul hell.

"Self-sufficing, obstinate, filled with the pride and intoxication of wealth, they perform lip-sacrifices for ostentation, contrary to scriptural ordinance.

"Given over to egotism, power, insolence, lust and wrath, these malicious ones hate Me in the bodies of others and in their own."

Who Are Spiritualists?

We often wonder if the people who are always holding Spiritualism up to ridicule even have the capacity to understand what they are talking about; we wonder if they are aware that such minds as Sir William Crookes, Camille Flammarion, W. T. Stead, Prof. Newbold, of the University of Pennsylvania; Prof. James, of Harvard; Dr. Richard Hodgson, of Oxford, Rev. Minot J. Savage and Dr. James H. Hyslop, professor of Logic in Columbia University, are all avowed believers in spirit return, and that makes any man a Spiritualist in principle. That is the real basic principle of Spiritualism, and we might continue to name professors and authors all over the world who have accepted the philosophy as the only explanation of the phenomena they have witnessed.

Spiritualism has acquired numerous distinguished converts within the past few years and can well afford to be held up to ridicule by those who "have no time for Spiritualists and don't want their dead friends to return." Their friends will not return to them if they are not wanted, and if "their friends" were as ignorant and blind as they are, they will have much to learn before they can find their way back. But other spirits can and do return and prove to the willing minds of earth the truth of eternal life and that knowledge is becoming pretty common and will yet be at the root of all religious

SCINTILLATIONS, FROM CALIFORNIA.

Will C. Hodge Presents Many Items of Especial Interest to Spiritualist Readers.

The Progressive Thinker reaches me with regularity in this sunny corner of Uncle Sam's domain, and is freighted with many good things for the spiritual man.

I have only missed one number, and was amazed when trying to borrow to find HOW FEW among the Spiritualists there are who make it a point to subscribe for any Spiritualist publication.

One man, when approached upon the subject excused himself by saying there were articles published with which he did not agree, while the majority pleaded poverty. Such people are indeed poor, but their poverty of purse is nothing compared with their poverty of spirit, for there is no Spiritualist so poverty-stricken that he cannot afford two cents per week for a Spiritualist paper, and the man who refuses because others disagree with himself, must either think that what he already knows is the limit of attainment, or his supposed truth must be on a very shaky foundation.

Free thought is decidedly in the ascendant in San Diego, and no person who has anything to say and who can say it well, will lack a hearing upon almost any subject announced.

Theosophy has a strong hold upon the people in this section, and when Katherine Tingley holds forth at Isis Theater the place is simply thronged. There is one feature of the service of the Theosophists which Spiritualists would do well to emulate, for they have at all times most excellent music.

Whatever one may think of Mrs. Tingley and her cult, the fact remains that she has been a most potent factor in liberalizing the sentiment of the community. Only once has the bigoted element tried to down her and this was by a concerted effort by preachers of the different denominations, whom she met with such a sweeping challenge of comparison between Christianity and her teachings, that they not only did not meet her challenge but have since let her entirely alone.

Spiritualism is fairly holding its own and is represented by two organized societies; the first society is still under the leadership of Mrs. Clara A. Beck, while Mr. Newcomb holds the guiding reins on National avenue. There are a number of very excellent workers among the local talent, including Col. Dryden, Mrs. Lily, M. Thiebaud, Mrs. Morrill, Mrs. Mullin, while among the mediums are Mrs. Elliott, and Mrs. Harder. The last mentioned has made wonderful progress considering that two years ago she knew nothing of Spiritualism, and she now bids fair to make one of the best public message mediums in the field.

There is no cause for worriment because many of the old workers have passed, or are passing, away; new ones are constantly being brought in, and I apprehend the invisibles who first inaugurated the movement will not suffer it to decline for the want of co-operative instruments on the earthly side. Most of our local talent are just now at Los Angeles Camp, but the local societies will neither of them suspend during the summer months.

I am speaking to good audiences every Sunday morning at National Hall, and for the month of September I will serve the First Society in LaFayette Hall. I have made the acquaintance of many very excellent and agreeable people in San Diego and do not for one moment regret returning to California, which I intend to make my home for the remainder of my earthly life.

Every land and clime has its drawbacks, and California is no exception; but there are few if any places where one can experience more satisfaction and enjoy more beauties than in San Diego County, with its wealth of sunshine, beautiful sea breezes, and great abundance of fruit and flowers.

Tent City, just across the bay on Coronado Beach, is just now the objective point of citizen and tourist, as the great hotel is closed for the summer season. In lieu of the hotel there are over seven hundred tents laid out with military precision, all of which are furnished with every convenience for living and are lighted by electricity. A pleasant and commodious reading-room occupies a central position. There are halls for preaching and dancing, as one may choose to elect, and every form of amusement known with the exception of looping the loop and shooting the chutes. Add to this a beautiful beach and the daily or nightly concerts of the Tent City Band with their rendering of high class music, the beautiful sunsets and invariably cool evenings, what more can a weary mortal desire in the way of amusement and rest.

I nearly forgot mentioning Mrs. Clark, one of the oldest and most successful healers on the Coast, one who has never advertised, but who has all the business she can possibly attend to.

"MEDIUMSHIP AND ITS LAWS," AND SYLVESTRE & CO.

It must be that the writer of this article is considered an easy mark for the fakir and trickster in modern Spiritualism, as from time to time he has received warnings, advice, and quite frequently has been requested to send a two-cent stamp to Sylvestre & Co., of your city, who are engaged in the business of selling tricks to whomsoever will buy, and for the purpose of discrediting mediumship.

A late mail has brought me one of these letters containing much kindly-meant advice, but bearing no date, and signed Walter Evans. For his benefit as well as others, and for the information of the numerous readers of The Progressive Thinker, I wish to say that a personal and extended interview with Sylvestre & Co. has enlightened me concerning their claims and methods. Fortunately for my purpose, they did not know me, and consequently regarded me as another dupe to their pretentions, as they were very anxious to do business(?) with me. Calling their attention to the fact that they had the Bangs Sisters listed in their circular, and that their method of receiving the independent writing would be explained for the small sum of ten dollars, and thinking the exposure of the trick well worth the money, I decided to invest. The ten dollars was to be handed over with my address, and in due time a typewritten explanation would be forwarded. Upon suggesting that with this procedure I had absolutely no show for my money as the so-called explanation might fail to explain, it was decided to agree upon a date when the explanation and the money should change hands. This appearing to be satisfactory to the firm, I casually remarked, "You will show me how it is done?" and was met with the reply, "No! we don't demonstrate." Insisting that if they could give a truthful and satisfactory explanation they could also demonstrate, they replied, "We do not demonstrate. We are not mediums. We simply sell these tricks; this is our business and carried on like any other business."

Upon suggesting that "money talks," which fact was admitted by S. & Co., I then made an offer of one hundred dollars, the money to be deposited and to become theirs whenever they would demonstrate the Bangs Sisters' methods, insisting they could do this if they could explain the trick.

Again the reply, "We do not demonstrate."

Upon calling their attention to the fact that according to their own statement they were fitting out tricksters to prey upon the general public, they replied: "It is none of our business what they do with these tricks; it is our business to sell them; that is the way we get our living."

Upon being asked why their business was not as reprehensible as that of any fake medium in the United States, they replied, "Some people might consider it so," and when assured that I did so consider it they suddenly came to the conclusion that "they did not care to do business with me on any terms whatever."

I know another party who offered these people one thousand dollars to demonstrate the Bangs Sisters' methods, and with the same result, "We do not demonstrate."

I will just say in passing that my own offer of one hundred dollars still holds good for an indefinite period and to all comers.

It is evident that all the suckers are not caught by the so-called fake mediums; very many are caught by the net of Sylvestre & Co.

Almost simultaneous with the appearance of Mr. Evans' letter, Hudson Tuttle's book, "Mediumship and Its Laws," was handed me for perusal. I have read it with great satisfaction, and know of no work on the subject that is so plain, and which covers the entire ground in so few words as does this book. Well written as all his works are, and so plain that all can understand it, it contains information that every investigator should know. There are scores of people, worse than throwing away their money on dark séances and the numerous developing(?) schemes afloat, who would do well to expend the price of just one of their favorite seances in the purchasing and reading of this book, thereby saving themselves much future pain and many shekels.

I do not agree, however, with the proposition that one who is honest and true in his mediumship, and who gives his entire time to the work, should not receive fair compensation and take money for his services. I do agree with the general proposition that commercial mediumship as largely practiced to-day is detrimental to the general public, to mediums themselves and to Spiritualism. He makes a plea against using spiritual gifts solely for a financial consideration, and for the establishment of the home circle which all true Spiritualists can endorse. Could the instructions which this book affords be faithfully carried out, Spiritualism would shine with a new lustre, looking for light in darkness would cease, and the fakir would go out of business for lack of patronage.

Shocking and Horrifying.

And now comes the young King of Spain, just freed from the authority of his very pious and intensely Romish mother, who has exercised all her will and wits to make him thoroughly and slavishly subservient to the Church in all things—he comes on the stage of action and manifests his independence in a manner that utterly shocks his mother, and horrifies the ecclesiastics of the Church.

Since his coronation, King Alfonso has been making a tour of Spain, and according to the newspaper reports, the most serious offense committed during his travels has been his skepticism concerning sacred relics of the holy apostles and the patron saints of the provinces of Spain. It has always been the custom, when the king visits Cabadonga, to expose the relics of St. James, the patron saint of Spain, with great ceremony and pomp, but while there recently Alfonso was not only indifferent to the honor, but actually refused to remain through the pontifical mass. He even questioned the authenticity of the relics in the presence of the archbishops and other prelates, who were so amused that they forgot to rebuke him. His words amounted to blasphemy, for the thoughtless boy declared that sensible men no longer believed in the stories of the miracles and that they were invented by the priests to humbug the peasants. His mother would have fainted from horror had she heard his words. At another place, when a venerable archbishop lifted to his gaze one of the most revered relics in all the kingdom and began to explain its wonderful history the young king sneered and turned his back in a most insolent and irreverent manner. How he could have acquired these heretical ideas is a mystery, for during all the years of his childhood and youth he has been under the tutelage of the ablest priests at court and the watchful care of his mother, although it is notorious that the Spanish army is filled with agnostics and French atheism is fashionable among the military officers by whom he has been surrounded. These reports have created a profound sensation among loyal Catholics and will cause inexpressible sorrow at the Vatican, for Leo XIII. is the godfather of the young king and Cardinal Rampolla baptized him.

Private advices say that half the court is laughing and the other half is weeping, while his royal mother is almost frantic with anxiety and grief; and it is said that if she know all he has said and done, she would snatch him from the courtiers and hurry him off to a monastery to reclaim his soul from Satan.

To a level-headed freethinker it would seem that, in respect to the Romish relics, the young king is decidedly sensible and correct in his judgment. And the fact that half the court is laughing indicates that there are many who coincide with him, even in intensely Romish Spain.

Perhaps the king may shock some new thoughts into the Romish cranium of his people.

A Genuine Ghost.

Spontaneous spirit manifestations are becoming very frequent. A late one, related by the Philadelphia (Pa.) Telegraph, has the impress of truth. It appears from the account given, that in the glare of a furnace at the Baldwin Locomotive Works, James McGlone, a laborer, declares he saw a ghost at 8 o'clock this morning. According to McGlone, the apparition was that of a man who had been killed at the works several days ago.

McGlone and a score or more of other men were busy in the machine shop this morning when the spirit is said to have appeared. The men had been working all night, and were eager to finish up their tasks before the day shift came to work. No one worked harder than McGlone, who is noted for his strength and endurance.

"Where's that big monkey wrench?"

It was the foreman of the gang of men who spoke, and McGlone went behind some big engine boilers to get the tool. Back of the boilers were the furnaces, their tongues of fire leaping out over the iron bars and plates that were lying upon the floor.

Above the roar of the furnaces the workmen suddenly heard a loud cry. Thinking that McGlone had met with some terrible accident, they ran behind the boilers.

Stretched at full length upon the ground was the man who only a few moments before had been the personification of strength and activity. As the workmen bent over McGlone he half raised himself and, pointing towards one of the furnaces, yelled out: "Oh, Tom! Tom!"

With a gasp he then fell over in a dead faint.

Not knowing what to make of McGlone's strange behavior, the other employes summoned a patrol wagon and sent him to the Medico-Chirurgical Hospital. At the hospital it required a half hour's hard work to restore the man to consciousness.

When McGlone opened his eyes he told a strange story to Dr. Widmeyer and the other physicians. He says that when he went behind the boilers to get the wrench, he felt a strange sensation come over him—a sensation that he could never find words to explain. It seemed as if some one was standing near him.

In searching for the monkey wrench, McGlone suddenly turned towards one of the furnaces, only to behold a sight that he says froze the blood in his veins. In the glare that came from the half-open door stood a man who had been instantly killed some time ago.

"He just stood there and looked at me with an awful sad, faraway look in his eyes," the ironworker declared to the physicians. McGlone says that the spectacle was too much for him, and that he fell to the floor and hid his face in his hands.

"I feel ten years older than I did yesterday," the man continued.

The doctors at the hospital do not know what to make of McGlone's story. The man was not drinking and is sincere in his belief that he saw a ghost. When he recovers from the shock that he received he will be taken to his home at Cleveland and Susquehanna avenues.

The Splendor Falls On Castle Walls.

The splendor falls on castle walls
And snowy summits old in story;
The long light shakes across the lakes,
And the wild cataract leaps in glory.
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O hark, O hear! how thin and clear,
And thinner, clearer, farther going!
O sweet and far from cliff and scar
The horns of Elfland faintly blowing!
Blow, let us hear the purple glens replying:
Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O love, they die in yon rich sky,
They faint on hill or field or river:
Our echoes roll from soul to soul,
And grow forever and forever.
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying, dying.

VISITS HEAVEN IN TRANCE.

Indiana Girl Professes to Have Seen a Remarkable Vision.

"While in a trance for a period of thirty hours, Miss Myrtle Dohner, daughter of a wealthy farmer, claims to have experienced a remarkable transition from earthly scenes to the heavenly domain. In a statement given to Rev. W. S. Tracy, pastor of Zion's Church, she says she was first ushered into a heaven where Christ sat upon a throne in magnificent splendor, surrounded by hundreds of angels waving palms. There were also many others, all robed in spotless white, and myriads of children graced the scene. Christ beckoned unto her, and the entire populace of the brilliant realm sang praises to the Lord.

"Next she was led into a different world. All was black and in a lake of fire. Satan's subjects were writhing in pain and begging for mercy. Satan smiled in derision at the suffering ones and asked Miss Dohner to follow him, but a guide interposed.

"Miss Dohner is one of ten who passed into a trance at a revival meeting in Salem Church. While in this state she spoke the names of three persons, declaring they had just become Christians. The three joined the church at that hour, but the girl was four miles from the scene where the conversion was recorded."—Chronicle.

Now and then the reading world is interested and surprised with accounts of experiences similar in character to this one in Indiana. Similar occurrences have transpired from time to time through all the ages past of man's history. Such trances are not peculiar to Christian people alone, but to Pagans and to wild men of the woods; to East Indian, to African, and to North American Indian.

It is a matter of peculiar import, and the fact has an important bearing on the explanation of the mystery, that the incidents in these psychological trances are always colored by the beliefs and previous thoughts of the entranced. The Indian's trance experience is suggestive of, or correlated to, his peculiar notions or beliefs; the African's experience bears a similar relation to his beliefs; and so, too, the Christian's experience in trance condition partakes of the nature of his or her notions and thoughts as held in normal condition. If these are colored by orthodox teachings, the trance experience will partake of the same general characteristics; and this was evidently the case with the Mishawaka lady mentioned.

The orthodox notions concerning heaven, hell, etc., without doubt had been impressed upon her mind by pulpit teachings and otherwise, and her imagination had made pictures of those places and scenes, which were duly infixed in her memory.

It is not for a moment to be supposed that these apparent scenes and incidents in her trance condition were actual concrete facts—though, to her, in her trance condition, they appeared to be realities.

As a matter of fact, as before stated, trance visions of this character partake of the subjects' previous conceptions and beliefs. The Catholic devotee's trance visions correspond to Catholic notions; the Protestant will have Protestant visions. Swedenborg believed in a heaven and a hell, and he saw them in the spirit world; further, he was strongly opposed to certain sects, and he found the members of those sects were in hell. In his trance state, all this appeared as a reality to him, and he so believed.

An interesting instance in illustration is related by the French author and mesmerist, Cahagnet. He mesmerized a peasant and directed him to visit heaven and report what he saw. The peasant reported that he saw a great white throne, on which was seated an exceedingly large man, who was dressed in clothes of a superior cut, make and material, and was surrounded by an immense throng of people all gorgeously dressed. He was sure he had seen God on his throne.

Of course this was simply his peasant idea of God and heaven. Cahagnet, however, convinced him he was mistaken, for the Bible taught that no one could see God and live.

He was then sent to heaven a second time, and reported that it was merely a conclave of leading spirits he had seen—Cahagnet having suggested to him that this was the case.

Not very long ago a Chicago lady had a vision, an account of which was written for and published in The Progressive Thinker, in which she saw "the blessed Savior," and on his head was a crown of thorns.

All such things are purely subjective trance occurrences. Of course, to the percipient they bear the appearance of objective realities, but they are all based upon and partake of the percipient's previous religious beliefs and notions. As before stated, if the percipient is a Catholic the trance scene will be Catholic; if Protestant, is will be Protestant; the Swedenborgian's trance experience will be Swedenborgian in character; and so, also, of Mohammedan, Buddhist, African or American Indian. The vision of the Chicago lady simply denotes the results of her church and Sunday-school training. It may safely be affirmed that, but for the previous introduction of churchly ideas into her mind, she would never have experienced such a vision.

In no case is it reliable that such subjective trance visions are to be accepted as true objective realities. While some of them may be pictures of realities sometimes, they are ordinarily visions resulting from imagined or fancied realities, the offspring of the percipient's beliefs, without other basis in fact, and having no other basis of existence.

It is to be noted that in all these cases of subjective trance visions, the normal objective faculties are practically dormant, while the subjective faculties are abnormally active, and these latter are practically controlled by suggestion arising from previous beliefs or ideas held in the mind. There is at least a partial hypnosis, self-induced or otherwise, in which state the uncontrolled subjective faculties are caused to see things that correspond to one's normally held beliefs, or, in some stages of hypnosis, the visions are in accord with the suggestions of another person's mind.

In proof of the unreliability of such subjective trance visions, it may be stated that, by proper suggestion given, the person in this trance condition can be made to see and hold conversation with pigs or other animals; and with the objective faculties dormant, they do not perceive the incongruity of the situation—all seems real and actual verity.

And yet, whole systems of philosophy and religion, as the Orientalism of India, and Swedenborgianism in the West, have been built upon the basis of such subjective visions.

The queer pranks and antics cut-up by the subjective faculties, when not governed by the balance wheel of the normal objective senses and mentality, are known to all, as experienced in the phenomena of dreams. In the dream state the objective faculties are in a dormant condition, in part or in full. The coequal and complementary action of the objective faculties are necessary to the perfect and normal action of the subjective faculties; without this coworking, the result is one-sided abnormality in mental action. The objective faculties being dormant, in sleep, while the subjective faculties are active and awake, these may run unreined and unbridled, at the will or whim of fancy or imagination, into all sorts of incongruous unrealities that, to it, appear veritable realities.

It is undoubtedly true, proven so by many actual instances and experiments, that persons in a certain stage of hypnosis, self-induced or otherwise, become in some degree, more or less, clairaudient and clairvoyant. Such seems to have been the experience of Miss Dohner, aforementioned, who declared, though four miles distant, that three young ladies whom she named had just become Christians. The three joined the church at that hour.

One vital lesson to be derived from these incidents is this, that such trance experiences cannot be relied upon as statements of actual objective facts—but are to be taken as merely subjective experiences which may widely vary from the real truth of things. They are psychological effects, and not actual realities, although to the psychologised they seem real.

THOSE LITTLE RINGLETS OF HAIR.

Only a few little ringlets of hair,
All clipped when my children were small,
When my heart was well loaded with care;
Just a few little curls, that is all,
And yet they are ever so dear and fair
As I look in their case on the wall.

Only a few little curls, did I say?
Not so, for their sweet memories are there;
The same tender kisses forever will stay;
And those eyes that so sleepily stare,
Though all have grown up and away,
Come back with those ringlets of hair.

Though some may be spirits above,
Some scattered about everywhere,
All gone from my presence, my love
Grown deeper with age is still there;
Each one is a mother's wee dove,
When watching those ringlets of hair.

Still heaves this old bosom the same;
Still beam those dear faces as fair;
Still thrills with emotion this frame;
Again my sweet baby is bare;
I sense those dear boneless gums; a name
Returns with each ringlet of hair.

It seems but a dream, a dream of some sweet,
Some precious occurrence out there,
Where angels and fairies in blissful retreat
Bright mansions for mothers prepare,
Or like a bright vision of hope, fair and fleet,
When I gaze at those ringlets of hair.

The Abolition of Death.

An Easter Sermon.

By Rev. Minot J. Savage.

My text you may find in the twenty-first chapter of the Book of Revelation, the fourth verse,—"And death shall be no more."

Towards the last of his life the late Colonel Ingersoll said—I quote his thought, not his language—if we could only be certain of continued personal existence, then the funeral of a friend would become a triumphal procession, a harvest home, accompanied, not by tears and heartbreak, but by songs of triumph.

But what has the attitude of men been towards the fact of death? It has been the one thing that has made the cup of every joy bitter. It has burdened the heart, it has blinded the eyes with tears, it has clouded the brightness of the fairest days, and made the hopes of life seem vanity and emptiness.

Perhaps you have noticed, as you have read the "Arabian Nights," how the stories, nearly all of them, close—"And so they lived until he came who is "the destroyer of delights and the sunderer of companies." This was their way of looking at death.

In the Old Testament the prevailing idea is that death is the end of all things—at any rate, the end of everything that appeals to human hope or human cheer. The writer of the Book of Ecclesiastes says, "Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor wisdom, nor knowledge in the grave whither thou goest." If they had any belief in an underground life, it was colorless and undesirable.

The old Greeks held a similar idea. They did, indeed, believe in Hades; but it was not the crown and triumph of life, something to be attained. It was something to be hated and shunned. For when Ulysses, in the story as Homer tells it, goes down into the underworld and meets the spirit of Achilles, he tries to comfort him by telling him of the great fame which he still enjoys up here under the stars. But Achilles says, Do not try to comfort me by any considerations like that. And he goes on to explain that he would rather be a servant of a taskmaster, engaged in the most menial of occupations here on the green earth, than to be the king of all the dead. This was the thought of the ancient Greek.

We know that during the Middle Ages death has been set forth as the terror of mankind; and, because the church was believed to have some power over it, it was able for centuries to dictate terms to kings and rule the empires with a power not possessed by the emperors themselves. Death has been the king of terrors, the one last dread, the end of everything fair and sweet and good.

Longfellow, you know, tells us,

> "The air is full of farewells to the dying,
> And mournings for the dead;
> The heart of Rachel, for her children crying,
> Will not be comforted."

And in spite of the fact that people claim to believe, or think they believe, death is not robbed of his terrors, the fact of death is not abolished.

Let me read you a snatch from a letter received within the last few days. I do it because it is so typical of the feelings of the human heart: "For months, ages, it seems, my whole being has been overwhelmed by this sorrow. No other thought occupies my heart night or day. Time, change, nothing brings relief."

I am aware that there are philosophical thinkers who, feeling compelled to give up any real belief in a future life, try to comfort themselves with the thought that the destiny of man is not so very hard after all. And yet those who dare face the fact speak of it in words like these. This is a saying of Mr. John Fiske: "If the world's long-cherished beliefs are to fall, in God's name let them fall, but save us from the intellectual hypocrisy that goes about pretending that we are none the poorer" That is his attitude towards the fact of death.

I wish to give you the word of one other famous writer. Years ago a book was published entitled "Theism," the name of the author was not given, but rather the pen name, "Physicus." At the close of what he regards as a scientific demonstration that there is no God and no future, he records the feeling that he has in view of these facts in the following words:

"And forasmuch as I am far from being able to agree with those who affirm that the twilight doctrine of the 'new faith' is a desirable substitute for the waning splendor of 'the old,' I am not ashamed to confess that with this virtual negation of God the universe to me has lost its soul of loveliness; and, although from henceforth the precept to 'work while it is day' will doubtless but gain an intensified force from the terribly intensified meaning of the words that 'the night cometh when no man can work,' yet when at times I think, as think at times I must, of the appalling contrast between the hallowed glory of that creed which once was mine, and the lonely mystery of existence as now I find it—at such times I shall ever feel it impossible to avoid the sharpest pang of which my nature is susceptible."

And then he goes on to close with the quotation of the terrific oracle to Oedipus:

"Mayest thou ne'er know the truth of what thou art."

I have a friend, a lawyer of much more than usual ability. Two or three years ago he was talking to me on this subject, and he expressed himself substantially after this fashion: "Here I am, walking a narrow plank that reaches out into the mist. I cannot see its end. I can only go on, step by step, into the darkness, and almost any day, I do not know when, I must step over the end into—nobody knows what." And he added, "I do not like it." This is the attitude of thousands of people today towards this great fact of death. Is it not true still, what Saint Paul indicated when, nearly two thousand years ago, he spoke of the condition of the world as, through fear of death, being perpetually in bondage?

Is there any way conceivable, then, by which death may be abolished, practically, for you and for me? There has been one period in human history when for a time death was practically abolished. I refer to the first few years of the history of Christianity. I do not know anything like it anywhere else in all the world. Paul, you remember, says from his point of view, "To die is gain," that "to depart and be with Christ is far better;" and he cries out: "O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory?" He had, as he believed, a knowledge—not a faith merely—a knowledge that abolished death and put a meaning and a victory into human life such as it had not known from the beginning of the world until then.

And this was a victory which was shared by thousands of early Christian believers. And I ask you to review that period in the history of the world, and see if I be not right when I say that it was this great belief in a Power that had conquered death which made the young church master of Rome and master of the world.

For what was it they believed? They had expected the coming of the Jewish Messiah. Jesus came, unannounced, and at last propounded the belief that he was the one that the ages had been expecting. But by and by, coming in conflict with the authorities, on a Friday afternoon, he is thrust outside the walls of the city and hung upon a tree. And he died, and the hopes of the disciples died with him.

Do you remember these two, on their way to Emmaus, how they said to the casual stranger who joined them in their walk, "We trusted that this had been he who was to have redeemed Israel?" But the trust was gone; they were crushed and scattered. But by and by, the daring whisper goes forth from lip to lip, and kindling hope from heart to heart, that the Master has been seen; and that means to those who could receive it that he had broken the bondage of death—not only for himself, but for all those who would trust in him. For, do you know, up to this time in Jewish history only two persons had ever gone to heaven, Enoch and Elijah; the rest were in Sheol, the underworld; and when Jesus broke loose from the bondage of death, he made an open way for others to follow him, became "the first fruits of them that slept," the promise of victory and deliverance for mankind.

This was the hope that sprung up in the hearts of the early disciples. They believed that Jesus was alive, and that meant that for humanity death was to be no more. For Paul believed and the early church believed—you need to know it and have it freshly in mind—that the Master was to reappear in the clouds of heaven, almost any time—at the farthest, as expressed in words put into the lips of Jesus himself, before this present generation shall have passed away, within twenty-five or thirty years. He was to appear. Then those who had died before he came were to be brought forth from the grave; and those that remained alive were suddenly to be transformed, to put off the mortal and put on the immortal body, and meet the Lord triumphant in the air.

This was the belief of Paul. It was this belief that fired his heart as he went forth on his missionary journeys. It was this belief that made maidens and young men, full of the hope and joy of life, meet the lions in the arena with a smile. It was this belief that made people eager to show their faith by martyrdom. They cared nothing for death; it was a fact put behind them, no longer having about it any touch of fear.

Do you wonder they conquered Rome? Put into the hearts of several thousands of enthusiastic people a hope, a belief in the immortal life, a belief that the death of the body means only the triumph and glory of the spirit all the sooner, and you have an army of men without fear; and conquest for such is easy. That was the belief of the early church.

Has it persisted? Is it the belief of the church to-day? You know it is not. Look upon those who claim to be Christians of the olden type, and to believe that this Easter morning celebrates the victory of the Master over death. Look at them, I say; and when a friend is taken away see them heartbroken, see them covered with crepe, see them cast down and without any cheering hope. The old belief is getting old; it is getting dim; it is far away. And, friends, if we propose to be quite honest and frank with ourselves, we must admit this one fact, that there never, since the dawn of Christianity, were so many people doubting concerning the future life as there are now; and they are not the ignorant people, they are not the bad people. They are the best people there are, or as good as there are. They are readers, thinkers, persons acquainted with philosophy and science, who have studied history, looked into ecclesiastical tradition. They are people who say, We must be honest with ourselves intellectually; and, being such, we see no adequate reason for belief in a life after death. This is the attitude of thousands of people in the modern world; and if I do not misread the facts, the number of these people is growing. It would have to be not merely a popular rumor but a fact scientifically investigated and verified by overwhelming evidence.

And let us admit freely one other fact. If a person asks me whether I think there is satisfactory evidence that the body of Jesus was raised from the dead, I must be frank and say I do not. No case in a modern court could be carried through successfully unless there were in its favor better evidence than we have for the resurrection of the body of Jesus. There is no first-hand testimony of anybody to that fact; and we know perfectly well that, if we had the testimony of a hundred or a thousand to a similar fact as taking place to-day, it would weigh with us very little.

Here, then, we are. Such I must say, in all candor and honesty; but let me balance that by saying something else. I cannot prove it to you scientifically as yet; but I believe with my whole soul that Jesus was seen alive after the crucifixion, and that out of that seeing sprang the great conviction which made the church triumphant over the empire of Rome. Out of that seeing might easily arise the belief that the body itself had risen.

Why do I believe it? I cannot go into any prolonged exposition of this faith this morning. I can simply say to you that, if I can believe that anybody since that time, who has been called dead, has been seen again, then it is perfectly easy for me to believe that Jesus may have been seen; and if there be any reason for believing a fact like this, then death shall be no more, for the natural fact of the natural immortality of man would be thereby demonstrated.

I propose for the time left me this morning to touch upon a few of those things which constitute the burden, the sting, the terror of death, and to outline a theory of things which, if we can accept, would abolish it, and give us victory over the grave. I shall not have time to enter upon proof, even attempted proof, of the positions I take. I shall, however, make no statement on behalf of which I believe that proof might not be offered. I shall say nothing that is not entirely reasonable and consonant with all our scientific knowledge of the universe.

The first terror of death is the fact that we must leave this fair and beautiful world, no more look at the brightness of the sun by day or the beauty of the stars by night; that we must go out into—what? Nobody knows, we are told.

Suppose, in place of this, that we may believe, what I do believe, that this physical universe of ours is immersed in what we may call, for lack of a better name, a spiritual universe. By "spiritual" what do I mean? It is very difficult to tell or to make clear. Science, however, talks about the "ether," a form of matter intangible, invisible, inaudible, and yet more wonderful than anything that can be touched or heard or seen; and it is demonstrated that such form of matter exists. We have learned enough about this material universe to know that the invisible and intangible and inaudible forces are unspeakably mightier and grander than all with which our senses ordinarily bring us into contact.

Suppose, then, that we are immersed in a universe like this, as real as this—if there be any distinction, unspeakably more real—thrilling, throbbing with a life of which we can only dimly conceive as yet—and suppose that, when we go away from the presence of the sun and the stars, we go into a world grander, fairer than this. If we can believe that, then the terror of going is taken away.

Another thing that seems bitterer, perhaps, even than this is the separation from friends, the parting with those we love; and, I take it, it makes little matter whether it is by their going or our own; it is being separated from somebody dearer to us than all the world. This is what makes death bitter.

But suppose we can believe that this separation is only temporary, only for a little while. We can bear to have friends go to Europe, to Australia, to the East, if we know they still live and remember and love us. We could put up with the fact of not seeing them again for ten or twenty or thirty years if we could feel assured that some time again we should see them, that we could look in their eyes once more, clasp their hands once more, hear the familiar voice once more, and know they were just the same old friends as ever. This I believe.

There are thousands of people who believe that death is the end of all; and if there is anything that we shrink from, it is the ceasing of this conscious life of ours, the going out into blank nothingness. Suppose we may believe that there is nothing in the fact of death that touches us in any material way of change; suppose we may believe that, when we pass into the shadow, it is only to come out into the light again, and to find that we are ourselves.

I do not believe, friends, that there is anything in the fact of death that changes us any more than going to sleep last night and waking up this morning. Why should there be? It is only tradition and an unfounded idea that it can have any such effect. I believe that death is only another kind of birth; that we graduate from this life, take the next step in an ever-advancing and ever-rising career of progress, and that we are just ourselves over there.

There is another terror that has haunted the imaginations of the world concerning this fact of death; and, though we who think we are more enlightened and liberated from some of the old superstitions have outgrown it, and though we sometimes fancy, thinking the whole world is like that little part of it which we are familiar with, that these things are left behind, yet there are millions, millions of people burdened and horrified by the fear that there is something in death which fixes the condition for good or evil, for joy or sorrow, forever. Millions of people in this country to-day still believe it, though every little while we are told in some newspaper paragraph that that is a thing of the past, and that, if any minister takes the trouble to preach against it, he is fighting a man of straw.

Suppose in place of that we can believe that God is just as good on the other side of death as he is on this side. Suppose we can believe, what is absolutely demonstrated as true, that it is one God and one law on both sides of death, in this world and in all worlds; that there is no such thing as arbitrary reward or arbitrary punishment, but that throughout the universe there are only results, inevitable results, beneficent results, wisely ordered results.

For, friends, let us not delude ourselves with the idea that, even if we believe in continued existence, it makes no difference how we live here. We make ourselves; and in making ourselves we make our hells and our heavens in this world and in all worlds, and not only now, but for evermore. A broken law must mean the result of a broken law; and God himself cannot help it without introducing disorder and breach into his perfect universe.

If we may believe that, when we have passed through the fact of death, we are just ourselves, what we have made ourselves, freed from certain burdens and disabilities, with the opportunity still to go up or down as we please, but with better opportunities for knowing the truth, for seeing clearly our situation, and so with larger inducements for going up and on—if we may believe this, then the greatest horror that has ever been connected with death, that fear of "something after death" of which Hamlet speaks, is taken away and we are free, in a free universe, with a loving God and Father and Helper and Friend to watch over us and lead us in whatever world we may find ourselves.

There is another fear connected with death. I find it in many a heart. Tennyson gives expression to it in more than one passage in his "In Memoriam." He wonders as to whether his friend Hallam will outgrow him, become so spiritualized, so wise, so noble in that other realm that the old ties and friendships of this life will become as nothing to him. And so I find in many another soul the fear that the loved in the other life may outgrow us, and that, when we get there, we shall have lagged so far behind that there can be no real re-establishment of the old sweet relations that made the past so dear.

I believe, friends, and it seems to me inevitable in the nature of the soul, that precisely the opposite to this is true. Jesus, the grandest soul in history, was not, for his greatness or his nobility and his spirituality, separated from people. He was not separated from the poor, the lowly, even from the sinful. He was brought close to them in that infinite, divine pity and sympathy that would lift and lead and help.

There are cases of supposed intellectual greatness coupled with unmanly personal conceit which have seemed to lift people above, at any rate out of sympathy with, their old-time friends. But the really great soul is greatest of all in tenderness and love, and stooping, brooding, lifting sympathy and care. And so I believe it true that those we have loved on the other side will not outgrow us, but, as they become mightier in spiritual statute, will only come closer and closer to us. So the theory which even the great soul of Lowell could put into verse seems to me unfounded. You will remember that he says concerning his own little girl who died:

> "Immortal? I feel it, I know it,
> Who doubts it of such as she?
> But that is the pang's very secret,—
> Immortal, away from me."

No, friends, let not that fear haunt us. Immortal, not away from us, but ever nearer, closer, in a bondage of love that never can be broken.

Then there are people who fear that there will be no opportunity to reorganize conditions over there, that they must be forever tied in bondage to associations which have established themselves here. I believe that many things which bring us into personal relations in this life are of the present, of the body, springing out of passing conditions, and that the bonds which hold us together when we are released will be the real ones, the ones that are created in the very essential nature of our being.

And the lives we have lived here are not wasted. This indicates another fear to which I have heard many a soul give expression. They say, We have studied, labored, learned here, but that life over there is so different from this that all that we have done here is thrown away. I believe, friends, that that life is such a natural continuity, that it is so closely linked with the present, that all we have done and known and suffered and sinned here, if we can rise above our sins and put them under feet, only help to make us into fitness for the life on which there we shall enter.

And so every duty well done, every kindly word spoken, every lesson learned, every sympathetic touch that binds us to somebody in sorrow and trouble, every action which indicates that we are men and women in the true and high sense of that word—all these things are only accumulating experiences and developments and growths that shall be carried on and help us to enter, with advantage, on that next stage in our career.

I have said, friends, that this is what I believe. I cannot enter upon the task of offering you evidence for it this morning. I believe that evidence, at any rate looking that way, evidence accumulating and increasing day by day, week by week, year by year, is coming more and more to underlie and buttress these beliefs; that this is the theory of human life that is by and by to take possession of the intelligent beliefs of men.

I cannot think that this great universe, rising under the impulse of infinite lifting and guidance for millions of years, is by and by to be snuffed out, is by and by to plunge over an abyss into eternal darkness and night. I cannot believe that the end of all our knowledge is to be that "there is nothing in it." I cannot believe that, as John Fiske says, we are to be put to a "permanent intellectual confusion." I believe that this is the prologue to a great drama, a drama illustrating infinite wisdom and infinite power and infinite love; that this is the prologue; that we are seeing here the rising of the curtain; and that what we call death is only a lowering of the curtain for the time that precedes the first great act; and that this is to go on unfolding in beauty and wonder and glory forevermore.

Now at the end may I read to you two or three words, familiar to you because they are so wonderful and beautiful and strong, which fitly crown that to which I have tried to give expression?

> "There shall never be one lost good! What was, shall > live as before;
> The evil is null, is naught, is silence implying sound;
> What was good shall be good, with for evil so much good > more;
> On the earth the broken arcs; in the heaven, a perfect > round."

If we may cherish the great beliefs I have tried to suggest this morning, then we may walk through life, not as those impelled by an evil force from behind—walk through life not dreading to grow old, walk through life believing that old age is not decay, but only ripening. We may walk through life until we come to what was the great Terror, and look him in the face and find that he is a friend.

> "Fear death?—to feel the fog in my throat,
> The mist in my face,
> When the snows begin, and the blasts denote
> I am nearing the place,
> The power of the night, the press of the storm,
> The post of the foe;
> Where he stands, the Arch Fear in a visible form,
> Yet the strong man must go;
> For the journey is done and the summit attained,
> And the barriers fall,
> Though a battle's to fight ere the guerdon be gained,
> The reward of it all.
> I was ever a fighter, so—one fight more.
> The best and the last!
> I would hate that death bandaged my eyes, and forebore,
> And bade me creep past.
> No! let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers
> The heroes of old,
> Bear the brunt, in a minute pay glad life's arrears
> Of pain, darkness, and cold.
> For sudden the worst turns the best to the brave,
> The black minute's at end,
> And the elements' rage, the fiend-voices that rave,
> Shall dwindle, shall blend,
> Shall change, shall become first a peace out of pain,
> Then a life, then thy breast,
> O thou soul of my soul! I shall clasp thee again,
> And with God be the rest!"

Father, in this great trust let us work, let us wait, let us be patient, let us be cheerful, and with the words ringing in our ears, "And death shall be no more," let us press on to that fullness of life that waits thy children forever. Amen.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache: all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial, postpaid. Call or write us about your case. We give advice free and positive proof of cures. A valuable book—Prof. Wilson's 100-page Dictionary of Disease, Free. THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning." Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

> "If a man could feel
> Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and > working-day,
> The spiritual significance burn through
> The hieroglyphic of material shows,
> Henceforward he would paint the > globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

MRS. MENDENHALL

Who Was Not Exposed at Chesterfield Camp.

To the Editor:—Having learned today through Mr. Macomber, of Anderson, Ind.; that you had written him for the facts as regards the alleged "expose" of Mrs. Mendenhall, medium, by one Mrs. G. W. Kinnard, of Anderson, Ind., I concluded to send you a clipping from the Anderson Morning Herald, the first paper in which was printed the sensational lie, since which time many other newspapers have copied, each enlarging on the subject so much as to render it difficult to know whether or not any two of them refer to the same falsehood. You can print such portions of the clipping as you think best, or the entire article if need be; but I want to review such points only as will best show the damnable character of both the article and its author.

Mrs. Kinnard, the would-be exposer, says: "Mrs. Mendenhall went to each one and collected 50 cents, making $10 in all."

The fact is, Mrs. Mendenhall did no such thing. She never in her life collected her fees for seances; nor were they collected by anyone else until after the close of a successful seance, and then by a gentleman, Mr. J. A. Cunningham, of Marion, Ind. Nor was the amount collected $10.

2. Mrs. Kinnard says: "Then came the rattling of the tambourines and the ringing of small bells," etc.

Not a word of truth in the statement. There was not a tambourine nor a bell within the cabinet or seance room. All the rattling and ringing, if any, was in her own cranium where the brains ought to be.

3. Mrs. Kinnard, says the editor of the Herald, "Was quick to notice that each time the spirit was practically the same shape as the one before, in height, weight and erectness. Once it appeared as a small child. Mrs. Kinnard also noticed that the spirit each time would be a woman. Not a man appeared."

Now, there were some fifteen or sixteen full form materializations appeared in fair view of all present. About a dozen of these were ladies, ranging in age from grandmas to young ladies, embracing as many sizes and shapes, heights and weights as there were forms. The costume worn was mostly of pure white, or from dark to jet black. Frequently two forms were seen instantaneously, one in white, the other in dark or black. Often one would be passing out of the cabinet as the other was returning; one, a small, beautiful little girl in white dress.

Three gentlemen appeared, one a tall man, one aged and large, the other medium-size; all three recognized by their friends present. Nearly all the lady spirits were recognized; the little girl was not known, or so stated, yet so beautiful that seemingly all would have loved to claim her.

Just how Mrs. Kinnard could have seen all these forms to be of one shape, height, weight and erectness, I do not know, but suppose it was in strict accord with the oneness of her purpose, viz., to falsify the truth.

4. The editor of the Herald makes Mrs. Kinnard to have grabbed it (the spirit) about the legs, and that it did not vanish, but fell backward and began biting and scratching. "Mrs. Kinnard hung to the spirit until the light was turned on. Then it was seen that the spirit was none other than the medium, Mrs. Mendenhall."

The fact in the case is, Mrs. Kinnard did not grab the spirit, nor any one else. She did, however, attempt to grab a spirit who had presented itself some half-dozen times in fair view of all, and was recognized by two gentlemen present as their sister. The spirit, no doubt, sensed the intent and darted backward, dematerialized in the quickness of a lightning flash, and Mrs. Kinnard got hold of the curtain which served to close the cabinet front or place of entrance.

No biting and scratching, unless it was with the relics of a lingering conscience of the grabber.

Mrs. Kinnard hung to nothing, as she did not touch the spirit; nor was the lamp turned up then, for it had been burning with a light strong enough for recognition of parties present during the entire seance, which still continued for some forty minutes later, in which time a beautiful spirit, former wife of a Mr. Cunningham, of Marion, Ind., appeared to him, in view of all, and conversed for five minutes in an affectionate and familiar way.

5. "The sitting was immediately broken up, and soon there were a number of infuriated mediums in the cottage." As just stated by me, the seance was not immediately broken up, but continued quietly for the time specified, and was closed with a lengthy talk and benediction by an Indian spirit control (Mattie Home), through the vocal organs of the medium, she being in a deep trance during the entire seance, knowing nothing that occurred. Suffice it to say the seance was a grand success, and no one in camp or out of it knew anything of an "expose" until next day when the Anderson Morning Herald, a scurrilous sheet, printed by one adapted to the occasion, was seen containing the unconscionable thing.

Now, all that follows my review of said falsehood, is of the same piece of cloth; false from start to finish, and unworthy of consideration, only to show the kind of stuff some people are made of.

Let all Spiritualist papers copy, and also others that have noticed the would-be "expose."

How a Woman Paid Her Debts.

I am out of debt, thanks to the Dish-washer business. In the past three months I have made $600,000 selling Dish-washers. I never saw anything sell so easily. Every family needs a Dish-washer and will buy one when shown how beautifully it will wash and dry the family dishes in two minutes. I sell from my own house. Each Dish-washer sold brings me many orders. The dishes are washed without wetting the hands. That is why ladies want the Dish-washer. I give my experience for the benefit of any one who may wish to make money easily. I buy my Dish-washers from the Mound City Dish-washer Co., St. Louis, Mo. Write them for particulars. They will start you in business in your own home.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

You should sign your own name and address to the items you send in; otherwise they may be cast into the waste basket.

Dr. Juliet H. Severance would like to make engagements to lecture the coming fall and winter. Will respond to calls to officiate at funerals at any point. Address 6127 Drexel avenue, Chicago.

Prof. W. M. Lockwood lectured at North Collins, N. Y., last Friday, Saturday and Sunday. His class work at Lily Dale was a great success.

Lillian Whiting, the well-known authoress, claims she has had communications with Kate Field's spirit. "Recently," she said, "I gave the Boston Public Library a collection of autograph letters which had belonged to Kate Field: Suddenly, one day, before the collection had been sent, I heard Kate's voice say as plainly as if she was in the room: 'Lillian, give the Poe letter to Mr. Stedman (Edmund Clarence Stedman, the poet).' I heard no physical voice, but the impression was as vivid as if some one had actually spoken. I did. A curious thing happened. Not long afterward I received a letter from Mr. Stedman in which he exclaimed: 'But how did you happen to send it? It is just what I need to go with my collection of Poe's manuscripts.' I had no knowledge of the value the letter would be to him. I have had other communications with Kate Field."

The Evansville (Ind.) Courier says: "The Evansville Society of Spiritualists have decided on account of the hot weather not to open their church to the public until Sunday, October 5, when their new pastor, the Rev. A. Scott Bledsoe, will occupy the pulpit. Rev. Bledsoe, who was here during last March, pleased the congregation so well that they extended the pastorate to him, which he has accepted. Rev. Bledsoe was formerly a pastor of the Christian Church for twelve years, but has been advocating the truths of spirit return for the last few years. He is a polished speaker and a fine test medium, and has been a recognized worker in the ranks of Spiritualists for a number of years. The Evansville Society of Spiritualists have arranged to have free meetings, which will be held every Sunday, beginning October 5, at their church, corner of Third avenue and Michigan street."

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley's engagements for September are: 1st to 9th, Ottumwa, Iowa; 10th to 16th, Hayesville, Iowa; 16th to 25th, Mt. Pleasant Park, Clinton, Iowa; Sunday, 28th, Lima, Ohio. After October 1st she can be addressed care general delivery, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Spiritual Research will open its meetings Wednesday afternoon, September 10, 1902, beginning at 2 o'clock. It will meet every Wednesday thereafter, in the Van Buren Opera House, corner of Madison street and California avenue. Good music and singing. Come and meet with us and have a good time. All are invited and will be made welcome.

N. Lightenus writes: "I am glad to note the progress of H. W. B. Myrick. He is growing because he has dared to step quietly and softly into the spiritual fields to investigate. Thus he casts a certain light—perhaps a side light—yet the rays shed from his orthodox lamp can never eclipse the grander and nobler light thrown out from the minds of such men as Mr. Tuttle, J. S. Loveland and Prof. Lockwood. Most of us die hard, or slowly, at least, since we are unable to master the adverse element of our early training. Would he, at this stage of his present conception of the eternal duration of the human soul, gladly bring Spiritualism down to the level, and into the power and control of the average orthodox mind? Will he?

Mrs. H. R. Edwards writes from Omaha, Neb.: "We closed our meetings here last Sunday evening. They have been well attended by earnest and attentive audiences. The venerable and veteran Spiritualist, Mr. Horace Dwelley, gave some very interesting experiences in Spiritualism at our last meeting. He has been a Spiritualist for fifty-four years, and an old resident of Omaha. I intend to go from here to Butte, Mont; Seattle, Spokane, Portland, Oregon, and San Francisco. Then starting to return home, I will go to Los Angeles, Salt Lake, Denver and Chicago. I will be pleased to hear from societies en route. I give lectures, tests and platform phenomena."

G. W. Kates and wife write: "Our many friends who look for us to report our wanderings in The Progressive Thinker, have been asking us what we have been doing that no letters appear lately from us. We have been too busy to write for the papers, and of course could not to our friends personally. Our time is all taken with traveling, holdering meetings and talking with visitors. We catch our business correspondence at whatever odd times we can obtain. We are daily pressed to make social visits and write personal letters. We do all we can—but the last two requests are almost impossible demands upon us, and we trust our friends will pardon omissions. During July we held twenty-eight meetings by appointment and took part in several social gatherings. We were engaged at five camp-meetings during August, and gave thirty-eight lectures, took part in eight extra meetings, besides the attendance we gave to conferences and social meetings. Many friends visited and met us at camps and held our unoccupied time. The missionary efforts and demands are exhaustive. We lead a strenuous life, and trust that the good people will give us their charity for seeming shortcomings and realize that we are doing our utmost to carry the good news and be your devoted associates and friends. September will be busily occupied at Minneapolis, Minn., La Crosse and Milwaukee, Wis., De Kalb, Ill., Massillon, Ohio, and Erie, Pa. We have a little open time for the East during November. For the year 1903, we desire to tour in a Southern route to California and along the Pacific Coast, returning via the Northern route. Address us at 600 Pennsylvania avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C."

A writer in the New York Tribune says: "My attention has been called to an obituary notice of the late Luther R. Marsh in the Tribune of August 16, in which the writer says: 'For many years Mr. Marsh, whose tastes were more for literature than the law, was a diligent student of the writings of Emanuel Swedenborg, and he was led to undertake the investigation of the phenomena of modern Spiritualism.' I do not wish to appear hypersensitive, but I must beg a short space to repudiate, on behalf of all New Church people (commonly called Swedenborgians), the apparent concatenation of ideas in the above quotation. The inference is that Mr. Marsh was led to investigate the phenomena of modern Spiritualism by the reading of Swedenborg. There is also an idea abroad that a close affinity exists between the Swedenborgians and Spiritualists. This is an utterly false conception. There is no imputation, except that of evil living, that New Church people resent more earnestly. There is no people who condemn Spiritism and all its works more severely. I may add that there is no church organization that intelligent Spiritists fear so much as the Church of the New Jerusalem, because they know that the New Church understands better than any other the laws of the spiritual world, and can penetrate and expose the evils and false teachings of Spiritism more perfectly." As a rule, Swedenborgians in the West feel very kindly towards Spiritualism; in fact, many of them believe its fundamental truths, and are in no wise antagonistic to it.

M. A. Artterback writes of the work done by Mrs. Dr. H. R. Edwards at Omaha, Neb.: "In her tests which follow her lectures, she clearly describes friends who have passed to spirit life, and gives names in full. My father, who has been dead for ten years, and of whom she knew nothing, she described so perfectly that I instantly recognized him. She answers correctly any question which is presented to her. She has made hosts of converts to the cause of Spiritualism here, and gained many personal friends who will regret her departure from our city. She leaves here the first of the week for new fields of labor."

The Dispatch, of Columbus, Ohio, says: "The Spiritualists of Ohio have closed their annual camp-meeting at Summerland, Millersport, after about one month of services. Those in attendance report many interesting events. The grounds where the meeting was held were presented by Mr. J. S. Woolley, of this city, and if the present plans are carried out will be greatly improved before the meeting in 1903. A new auditorium is to be constructed at a cost of $3,000 and it is proposed to have it completed in time for the next session. It will be 70x100 feet, and the funds are to be raised on the stock plan. Mr. Woolley says that there will be no trouble in securing the necessary funds. The association increased its membership during the meeting just closed, making the total about fifty. It is also proposed to construct eight or ten new cottages during the year, and a new library with seance room will be added in the near future. The association elected the following officers for the ensuing year: Honorary president, Hon. S. J. Woolley, Milo; president, Dr. David Climer, Columbus; vice-president, Mattie E. Clemens, Columbus; general manager, Lawrence Climer, Millersport; secretary, Hattie G. Webster, Columbus; treasurer, Dr. W. S. Clemens, Columbus. Directors, David C. Climer, Columbus; George Shore, Shawnee; W. J. Workman, Pleasantville; Mrs. E. W. Lawrence, New Castle; John F. Grove, Columbus; John F. Baker, Newark; W. S. Clemens, Columbus; John C. Hayes, Jeffersonville; Samuel Cly, Lancaster; G. W. Carter, Linscott, and Rev. A. P. Conant, Columbus."

D. W. Hard writes: "I have an old friend who has been honored with the office of justice and notary public for forty years; also a member of the State Assembly and various offices of trust, who tells me the following experience in occult mysteries: He says that for years he has been apprised of the death of a friend or relative in a singular manner. When seated in his office, often at the midnight hour, he hears far in the distance the faint bark of a dog; it comes gradually nearer until under his window it gives full tone. Never yet could he discover any dog in connection with the sound, but the next news would apprise him of the death of a friend. Another old friend, respected for his sterling qualities, with a pleasant home and surroundings, died three years ago. Long before his sickness he made his will, arranging his property for the best interests of his family. He bore his sickness with cheerful patience. Before he died he said to his wife that a spirit told him that he would be called home with the angels in a certain month, and in a certain year, all of which came true."

The officers of the Wheeling, W. Va., Spiritualist Society, Henry Brunhaus, president, send the following endorsement of Mr. Kaiser: "We, the officers of the First Progressive Spiritual Society of Wheeling, W. Va., do cheerfully make the following statement: Whereas, Mr. A. W. Kaiser came among us representing himself to be a trumpet medium, and we individually had a sitting with him under what we consider strict test conditions, and we solemnly certify that the manifestations which came through him were genuine and of such a character that was overwhelmingly convincing to us of his honesty in his phenomenal power, and we cheerfully recommend him to any Spiritualist or honest investigator of the truth as an honest gentleman as far as we know." The above endorsement of Mr. Kaiser shows that he did honest work at Wheeling, but it does not in any way refute the statement made in the communication of C. H. Toler, who says that he (Kaiser) was detected with the trumpet in his hands making the manifestations, at Marietta, Ohio. We are glad to give both sides of this question. Admitting both statements to be true, then the reader can draw his own conclusion.

Last week Moses Hull passed through the city on his way to Los Angeles (Cal.) camp-meeting. We looked for him at the depot, and he looked for us at 40 Loomis, hence the "look" of each was in vain.

Will C. Hodge writes from San Diego, Cal.: "I have been reading Hudson Tuttle's 'Mediumship and Its Laws,' and only wish every Spiritualist and investigator would not only read it, but heed its teachings. I thought it would be timely to give the result of my own investigation."

A. K. Venning writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "I am at a loss to know whether to accept Prof. Loveland's words seriously or as a joke, that the bent of my mind prevents me from appreciating. He writes under the heading, 'Is Mediumship Dangerous?' 'It is ignorantly assuming that somebody of some other world knows more about this world and its workings and destiny than ourselves.' Does Prof. Loveland think that there is no other world or sphere which contains beings who know more than man on the earth? And one other question: What does Prof. Loveland think becomes of those beings who have lived on the earth—I will not say aeons to avoid all disputatious questions—a few thousand of years ago? Are they all dead, or do they gradually degenerate and become useless idiots?"

Mrs. C. H. Mullins writes from Chesaning, Mich.: "I have been enjoying the beautiful weather in this State for one week; spent last Sunday (a week ago) at Benton Harbor and St. Joe. I left Benton Harbor Monday forenoon for Reed City. Wednesday I left Reed City for Flint; from Flint to Owasso, and Saturday afternoon I came to this delightful little town. I find in all the places I have been many who are seeking the truth. There are many old-time Spiritualists here, and many more who have come into the thought only a short time ago. They are abundantly able to support a Spiritualistic church, own their own building, etc. They need an excellent speaker. They are intelligent people, and only the best speakers would satisfy them. I am delighted to find so many people reaching out for our truth. I am surprised to find so many Spiritualists who do not take any Spiritualistic paper. However, I met one old-time Spiritualist who said: 'Why, I can't get along without The Progressive Thinker,' and with a great deal of enthusiasm he said: 'It's the best Spiritualistic paper printed in the United States. It contains more real knowledge.'" Mrs. Mullens thinks that the National and State organizations should organize the Spiritualists at Chesaning.

D. W. Hard writes from Wadsworth, Ohio: "I am indebted to my son in Michigan for the blessed privilege of reading your paper. Spiritualism comes to me naturally, as my ancestors were among those who accused Cotton Mather of being a tyrant and murderer of innocent men and women, for which George Burroughs was executed. My father and mother were among the early pioneers of the Styx Valley, where I was born. They were followers of John Murray, when to be a Universalist was the synonym of all that was bad in the eyes of the churches. A strong Abolitionist, he often saw many poor slaves sent on their way to freedom. So you see my parental influences prepared me for the glorious light that shone upon the world from Hydesville in 1848. When I saw innocent children at their play controlled to write communications from people long since passed the door called death, I had no doubts. I have drained the cup of sorrow and disappointment to its very dregs, but the angel messengers of love have ever comforted me. When the priests sent forth the note of warning that the Devil was abroad, the children were admonished and called in from play, but many accepted the new light in our valley. Death and removals have decimated the little band, yet their holy influence is still felt. A different class of people, more orthodox, have taken their places, but the leaven is working for good. Spiritualists and Free Thinkers can stand shoulder to shoulder with them, help build their churches, while our funerals are well attended. As we have no official speaker, it is customary for any of the friends on such occasions to express in their own manner their eulogies on the dead, and this has been so satisfactory that objectors are few."

S. Hartman writes: "The article in the issue of August 30, signed 'Free Thinker,' suits me exactly, only he might have added that the curse of 'Godism' has afflicted humanity for many thousands of years, and hundreds of millions of the human race have been slaughtered at the behest of those warring Gods. About twenty-five years ago Mrs. Lois Waisbrooker wrote a book entitled, 'The Curse of Godism.' We venture to say that had she been acquainted with the full history of the wars of the Gods in all ages of the human history, as it is so vividly portrayed in the 'New Bible' given through the mediumship of Dr. J. B. Newbrough, she might have written a larger, more forceful and sarcastic book. Let this modern free thinker procure that excellent work."

Addie Rogers writes: "There is a great deal said now against mediums and healers making charges for their services. I fully believe in reciprocity; without it the law is only half fulfilled. How few people appreciate or put a proper estimate on the importance of the spiritual gift. Many people pride themselves on giving their services, fully expecting nothing in return. This one idea alone destroys love, and charity becomes a disease. Has not the immutable law been stated—equivalent in return for services rendered. All desire to be honest and free in their dealings, and when they can realize this subtile error, they will hasten to correct it. Nothing that has yet been given forth to the world has been more beneficial to humanity than the voice of the spirit, the spiritualized word of God, and why not place upon it a high standard of reciprocity."

Arthur F. Milton writes: "The very question, 'Is Mediumship Demoralizing?' seems almost absurd, though it does require answering occasionally. Is Christianity, per se, demoralizing because good Christians are every year hanged for murder? Is any gift demoralizing because a number will debauch it, may also be asked. I know many and of many who were morally benefited by the development of mediumship, and of none who were injured by it. But such may be possible, where selfishness dominates, where one's spiritual birthright is sacrificed for personal ends, in which greed, lust or injustice takes the leading role. With good will, self-control or justice ruling, all may 'lift the veil,' and find themselves on sacred ground, with the 'gates ajar,' and light streaming forth as a guide towards a haven of safety."

First Spiritualist Temple, Lakeside Hall, Indiana avenue and Thirty-first street. Conference at 3 p. m. Dr. J. M. Temple will lecture, and Mrs. Lucille de Loux will give messages.

Lorenzo Worthen writes approvingly of the good work done at Sunapee Lake Camp, N. H., by J. Frank Baxter, Fannie Spaulding, and Edgar W. Emerson. This ends the twenty-fifth annual Sunapee Lake Camp-Meeting. Mr. Worthen says: "The camp this season has been a successful one in every way. Harmony and good will prevailed throughout the camp, and many good wishes were expressed for its future success."

Charles V. Schmidt announces that Mrs. Mattie E. Hull has been engaged for the Unity society of Milwaukee, Wis., for the month of October.

ON THE PACIFIC SLOPE.

Some Eminently Sensible Suggestions.

I reached the coast July 5, my first objective point being the New Era Camp-Meeting. This was my first trip to the West, and as it was raining for the first several days after reaching this place, my first impressions were rather adverse to the country. Indeed I had nearly made up my mind to return to Kansas as soon as my camp-meeting work was done; but everybody told me I would change my mind after I had been here awhile. I am not certain but they were right. Indeed my mind may change me after I have had a little more experience in the matter. But then the winter is coming on, which is said to be very disagreeable. By that time, however, I expect to be in California, and Oregon and Washington may thus lose none of their reputations they are now acquiring.

New Era Camp-Meeting Association has pretty grounds covered with splendid great fir trees, some of them six feet through at the roots, and the campers are a very earnest class of people. The workers there were Rev. Copeland of Burleigh, Irene Smith of Seattle, Rev. H. S. Lake, Rev. C. C. Love of Portland, and your correspondent. Mrs. Ladd Finnecan was the principal test medium. I cannot say that there was complete harmony in the meeting. About all the speakers were Socialists, and several of them gave complete lectures on the subject. It so happened that these were about the first lectures given, and it began to be feared that Spiritualism would be tabooed in the meetings. Indeed when it came time for your correspondent to lecture he was asked what he was going to talk on. This he could not answer, as he had not settled definitely on any subject as yet. He was then informed that if he was going to talk on Socialism his interrogator would take some pains to be absent. I had no intention to talk on Socialism, but this challenge was to me almost an insult; it was equivalent to a dictation, and if ever I feel like doing a thing it is when I am told not to do it. I merely hint that such talk was impertinent, and that until the suggestion was made I had no intention of talking out of my regular line, something pertinent to intercourse with the spirit world, and that probably I should ignore his banter and take up some of the Bible evidences of Spiritualism. He was there and heard me.

Yet, I do not think that so much Socialism (politics, they call it) and so little Spiritualism is the proper way to open up a camp-meeting. Spiritualism should ignore no reform, as all reforms are more or less related, and it would be perfectly proper to introduce any relevant subject in your lectures, but when we get nearly or quite a week's time at a camp-meeting without a mention of Spiritualism, people are liable to become restive and pounce onto all the lecturers indiscriminately. Poor Tray finds himself in bad company.

With the exception of Bro. G. C. Love and your correspondent all the speakers were reincarnationists, and you may be sure, before I learned Bro. Love's views on the matter, I began to feel lonesome. However, I arose to speak one day and some one gave reincarnation as the subject of the lecture. I handled the subject as gingerly as I could, and found I had the sympathy of those I opposed, notwithstanding our adverse views on the subject.

The bad weather at the commencement made the meeting small to start in, but interest increased as the weather grew better. One of the pleasant features of the meeting was the ordination of Rev. J. H. Lucas, of Portland, as a minister of the gospel of Spiritualism, which service was performed by your correspondent. Financially the meeting was a success.

In the interim preceding the Etna (Wash.) Camp-Meeting, I spoke two Sundays in Portland, once at Bro. Love's meeting in East Portland, and once at Bro. Lucas' meeting.

The New Era Camp-Meeting opened about the 10th. Bro. Mills, president of Washington State Spiritualist Association, was to assist me in this meeting, but he was taken down sick, and could not come. Sister Frances A. Sheldon, of Tacoma, got the camp-meeting, but she immediately took sick, so that the people were compelled to accept my services altogether. It is not often I get a camp-meeting in that kind of a fix, and you may be sure I made most of my opportunity. I rather think I was easy on them, as they have spoken for my services next year, which I promised to give to them, provided I could be on the coast next year, a matter hard to decide.

Sister Sheldon so far recovered as to assist about the closing up of the meeting. On this occasion, I feel that I should give Mrs. Sheldon more than a passing notice. She does some platform descriptive work, but prefers the intellectual part of the work, as much of the descriptive work only satisfies an idle curiosity of an unthinking class of persons, yet she believes that descriptive work is something useful to honest seekers after evidence. She is an all-around woman. She can give descriptive work if necessary, her lectures are beautifully worded and always instructive, her presence is impressive and she is a born organizer. She easily gets into the graces of the young people and never fails to interest them in Spiritualism and kindred reform matters.

At the close of the camp she organized a Young People's Auxiliary Society for the purpose of supplementing something to the camp-meeting program, and also to assist with funds to carry on their work.

The people of New Etna deserve great credit for the success of this camp-meeting. It has been gotten up within the last three months, after it was ascertained that I was coming to the coast. Etna is nine miles from the nearest town, in the heart of a wilderness, and before the camp-meeting could be had the woods was divested of its undergrowth—a big job, I assure you, but they came out clear of all expenses and had something left over for next year. There are but few old Spiritualists in this neighborhood. The most of them never heard a lecture till they heard me. This is the home of Henry B. Allen, one of the best physical mediums in the world. It is through his ministrations that a large society has been raised here. His excellent wife is the conductor of the Children's Progressive Lyceum, which is thriving and pleasing all who witness its progress.

The young people here are a credit to any society. I found a noble set of young men and women at Villa Ridge, Ill.; not so many as at this place. I wish they could become acquainted with each other. The young men here have one bad habit I wish they could free themselves from. That is using tobacco—smoking often in the presence of ladies. They are so accustomed to the habit that it does not in any way appear vulgar to them. If they should quit the use of the weed a few years, it would look entirely different from what it does now. The Villa Ridge, Ill., young men do not use tobacco in any form, and I am afraid that if they were to be thrown together the Etna girls would all marry the Villa Ridge boys, and as the Villa Ridge girls are too refined to accept of a tobacco user, they would be left husbandless.

I am lecturing at present in the country near where the camp-meeting was held. Bro. Henry Allen and I start soon up the Sound on a combined lecturing and demonstrating tour. I have also promised some work to the State Spiritualist Association of Oregon, which I shall try to accomplish as soon as relieved from work in this State.

Our Cause in Toronto, Canada.

Great interest in the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism is manifested in Toronto. The meetings of the Toronto Spiritualist Association are well attended, and the thinking and reasoning classes are freely asserting their opinions as to the pagan origin and absurdity of the creeds and teachings of the so-called Christian or orthodox churches.

While the philosophy of Spiritualism is in sympathy with and endorses the moral teachings of the orthodox churches, also in "doing unto others as you wish to be done by," it goes still further and throws down the monster barriers of prejudice, and opens gateways to the human mind giving free entrance to new and broader truths, spiritual, scientific and social.

Spiritualism knows no fear or cowering under the tyranny of man-made creeds, but rejoices in the liberty and grandeur of the divine motto, "The world is my country; to do good is my religion."

Mrs. J. A. Murtha, platform test medium, has just closed a four months' engagement with our association, and has given excellent satisfaction. She returns here for the months of October and November. She will serve the Toledo, Ohio, society for the month of September; has some open dates, and would be pleased to hear from any society desiring her services. She may be addressed during September at 419 Twelfth street, Toledo, Ohio.

Mrs. Loe F. Prior serves our association during the month of September.

Kola Plant CURES HAY FEVER AND ASTHMA.

The Kola Plant.

FREE. The African Kola Plant is Nature's Positive Cure for Hay-Fever and Asthma. In the short time since its discovery this remarkable botanical product has come into general use in the hospitals of Europe and America as an unfailing specific cure for Hay-fever and Asthma in every form. Its cures are really marvelous. Dr. W. H. Vail, a prominent physician of St. Louis, Mo., writes March 8th, 1902, that he used Himalya on six different Hay-fever patients last fall with satisfactory results in each case. Mrs. M. A. Scott, Crosby, Mich., writes March 6th, 1902, that Himalya completely cured her after fifteen years persistent suffering of Hay-fever and Asthma. Rev. J. L. Combs of Martinsburg, W. Va., wrote to the New York World, July 23rd, that Himalya cured him of Asthma of thirty years' standing. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, editor of the Farmer's Magazine, Washington D.C. was also cured, although he could not lie down for fear of choking, being always worse in Hay-fever season. Hundreds of others send similar testimony proving Himalya truly a wonderful remedy. As the Kola Plant is a specific constitutional cure for the disease, Hay-fever sufferers should use it before the season of the attacks when practical, so as to give it time to act on the system. If you suffer from Hay-fever or Asthma, in order to prove the power of this new botanical discovery, we will send you one trial case by mail entirely free. It costs you absolutely nothing. Write to-day to The Kola Importing Co., No. 1162 Broadway, New York.

NEW EDITION
THE LYCEUM GUIDE
BY EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

Do you want to organize a society for the social, intellectual and spiritual advancement of the children and adults?

THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM furnishes all you desire.

Do you want a self-sustaining society, founded on the basic principles of the spiritual philosophy? You have it in THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.
It furnishes a system of evolution by internal growth; not the old cupand pitcher Sunday-school.
It has something to interest and advance every member, and those who are most active in teaching are the ones who learn most.

NO SPECIAL INSTRUCTOR REQUIRED.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE gives every detail needed for effective organization, and for conducting the society when established.
It has Golden Chain Recitations; the prettiest songs and music; choral responses; a service for a Band of Mercy; calisthenics; how to make the badges, flags and banners; marching exercises; full instructions in conducting the exercises, with parliamentary rules, etc.
Many Spiritualists living in isolation, have formed lyceums in their own families; others have banded, two or three families together, while large societies have organized on the lyceum platform, and found great interest in this self-instructive method.
Do not wait for a "missionary" to come to your assistance, but take hold of the matter yourself, procure copies of the GUIDE, and commence with the few or many you find interested.
Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle (address, Berlin Heights, Ohio) will answer all questions pertaining to lyceum work.
The price of THE LYCEUM GUIDE is 50 cents, postpaid, or by the dozen, 40 cents each, by express charges paid by receiver. Address

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

C. L. Blair: It is not possible to give with any accuracy the number of Spiritualists in the states of Maryland, Virginia and Delaware. No statistics have been gathered and an estimate would be nothing more than a random guess.

H. Brown: Q. Is the spirit affected by the physical deformities of its earth life?

A. The infirmities of the body are temporarily reflected on the spirit after its departure, but in time these are cast off as the spirit advances.

Geo. L. Nixon: The colored light produced by pressure on the eye-ball is caused by irritation of the cells of the optic nerve.

Mrs. L. Hecker: Q. Why, when two persons are in animated conversation does one become somnolent?

A. It is indicative of sensitiveness of the one feeling sleepiness and may be the effect of the hypnotic power of the other person, unconsciously exerted. The relation between such individuals has been termed positive and negative, but this is only giving names, and really explains nothing.

T. F. Lee: Q. Who was Chrishna?

A. According to Hindu myth, he was the eighth Avator, or reincarnation of God, and the savior of mankind. The date of this world-event is quite indeterminable, but is placed at least 1200 years B. C. To make this name and that of Christ less similar, some writers return to the Greek spelling Krishna, but if this be followed with one name it should with the other, even more essential with that of Christ as distinctively Greek. The life history of Chrishna as told in the sacred books of India, is almost a repetition of those more than a thousand years after recorded of Christ. The Bhagavat Gita, the most exalted poem in the Sauskrit sacred language, and regarded as the most holy of all the holy books, records the wonderful moral teachings of this incarnation of God for the purpose of saving mankind. He came to atone for the sins of the world by "pouring out his blood as a propitiatory offering," from the cross. He was humbly born. He performed miracles, as healing lepers, restoring sight to the blind, raising the dead, casting out devils, etc. He was virgin-born, like all the ancient gods; the mother and babe were visited by shepherds, wise men and an angelic host who sang, "In thy delivery, O favored of women, all nations shall have cause to exult." A tyrant ruler (Causa, not Herod) had all the first-born put to death that he might surely kill the divine child; the mother and child escape by the miraculous parting of the waters of the River Jaurna; Chrishna as he matures retires to the desert; he is baptized in the holy Ganges; is transfigured at Madura to prove his divinity to his disciples when he said, "present or absent I shall always be with you."

He had one favorite disciple. Women of the magdalen character anointed him. He taught in parables. His doctrine of peace, and moral sayings were similar if not identical. In all over three hundred parallels have been pointed out, making the two characters identical in everything but in date of birth. Christ is a reproduction of Chrishna, and the cross on which both are said to have perished is as sacred to the Hindu as the Christian. After the crucifixion he passed three days in hell that he might suffer for the spirits confined in darkness. After his resurrection and before he ascended to heaven, he taught the most elevating morality. "He taught," says Max Muller, "the equality of all men, and the brotherhood of the human race," "self-denial, chastity, temperance, the control of passions, to bear injustice from others, to suffer death quietly, and without hate of your persecutor, to grieve not over one's own misfortunes, but for those of others," were cardinal doctrines. Hardy, Wesleyan missionary, admits that "every shade of vice, hypocrisy, anger, pride, suspicion, greediness, gossiping and cruelty to animals is guarded against by special precept."

J. P. Anderson: Q. When and by whom was made the first deck of cards? Are they not an inspiration for evil?

A. It is a current story that the game of cards was invented to amuse Charles VI. of France (1393). This, however, is not true, for cards were mentioned as being in use in 1340, in a romance, "Reuard la Coutrefait."

It is claimed on good authority that the game was brought to Europe by the Saracens in 1379. Another claim is that Edward I. (1377) learned to play while residing in Syria. It is only certain that the game is of Eastern origin, and was brought to Europe by the returning Crusaders. The term "deck" is an old English form. There is no doubt that cards leads all other games in the variety of games and combinations and the enchanting mystery which surrounds them. Something of the old beliefs and superstitions of savages regarding the printed word is yet held in regard to them, and they are used to foretell the future with the assiduity and confidence that they are dealt in games where fortunes are at stake.

Yet we are not prepared to say that there is intrinsic evil in the "deck" or the games. All depends on the spirit of the players. If it is social enjoyment and recreation, cards furnish just the sufficient stimulant without overtaxing, that allows of conversation as well as the play.

If used for gambling, another name for robbery, the good becomes evil and only evil.

Puritan hatred of everything that gave enjoyment is responsible for a great deal of the evils which have grown out of card-playing.

The deacon may whip his son for being caught with cards in his pocket, but that son will continue the game in the barn garret, and perhaps later in the guarded dive of a saloon. Better have allowed social games with his sisters in the parlor, than made it a sin so alluring that it drew him away.

J. J. Hollingsworth: Q. In speaking of the celebrated Koon's spirit room, you mention the peculiar form of battery invented by the controlling spirits and made according to their directions; cannot this be restored? It may have a great value.

A. Whatever this "condenser," as it was named by its spirit designers, may have been, it appears from the published descriptions to have been quite incomprehensible, and not along lines of the known laws of magnetism or electricity. The maker—Mr. Koons—departed without leaving any definite plan, and its value probably was given by the surroundings—the phase of manifestations which it was designed to assist in presentation. It may be taken for granted that if assistance of this kind became at any time desirable, it would be revealed. In fact I am informed by several correspondents that they are at work on somewhat similar "batteries" and one in the furtherance of telepathy or sending thought waves to a distance has already given promise of success.

CRITICAL COMMENT

Qu Some Dogmas of Spiritualism.

Dogmatism should not exist in connection with Spiritualism, yet dogmatic views do exist with many who claim affiliation with Spiritualism, while holding to theoretical views that have never been proven except in the imagination of the believer, who seems more a student of material than spiritual law, and the latter provides for eternal progression, and does not contain any retrogressive clauses.

The more common differences in the beliefs of Spiritualists are with regard to evolution, and reincarnation or successive embodiment, and it is quite astonishing how tenaciously some of the recognized great exponders of Spiritualism cling to these fallacies.

In all the arguments I have heard, and the articles and sermons I have read in support of these theories, they have all had the appearance of simple assertion based upon the assumption that it was necessary for the perfection of that which had previously been imperfect, but those wise teachers do not explain just when or how the disembodied spirit of an animal loses its identity and becomes embodied in a human child, nor how and when the disembodied spirit of that human being gives up its place in spirit world, loses its identity and all previously attained growth and knowledge and takes lodgment within another new material form for the stated purpose of improvement upon the previous embodiment period, with no recollection of where or what that period or its conditions were, which thus makes it possible that the new embodiment may be less perfect than the former, which in order to be improved upon, must be remembered, just as the artist who paints a picture and later wishes to paint another upon the same subject for purposes of improvement, he must either have his first picture before him, or at least a complete and accurate memory of it, else how is he to know he is dealing with a subject previously handled, or that he is trying to improve upon anything of previous existence, no record of which exists in provable form.

There is no time either in the here or hereafter when mankind will know all, for that position belongs only to the Supreme Ruler. I think, however, it is undisputed, by Spiritualists, at least, that there is greater knowledge among the inhabitants of spirit world than those who inhabit this material world, and it is therefore probable that the unbiased opinions of those who have been in spirit world a long time, and whose correct life both here and there makes information from them more reliable when received through a sensitive who is pure, upright, honest and unselfish, than the theories of a mortal who deals in "ifs" and "becauses," or the opinions of the inhabitants of the lower spiritual spheres, given through one whose life and habits are such as to attract only the spirits who have not progressed beyond their previous worldly and deceitful condition.

It has been my experience to receive evidence upon the subject in question through many kinds of instrumentality, and from many spirits in various spheres or conditions, and it is good common sense to accept the views from the higher conditions of spirit life through a clean, impartial instrument, rather than those of the lower spheres through unclean, selfish instrumentality. The higher class evidence is that reincarnation or successive embodiment exists only in theory, which is proven by the demonstrable fact that growth, education, perfection and progression not attained while in the body, is obtained in the spirit spheres, which therefore obliterates all necessity for returning to perfect in material form that which has already been done in spiritual form, and which latter is the admitted higher condition to be gained.

There must be an incentive or reason for all things, and nature's laws provide for continuous progression, and not retrogression.

If it were necessary for spirits to return to material conditions to complete their growth and education, they would not be allowed to complete or even add to them in spirit world.

The same wind never blows past us but once, the same glass of water is never drank but once, the same bark never belongs to but one tree, and one individualized spirit never becomes another. To those who are clinging to the fallacies mentioned, I can only say as was said to me by a spirit who, when in the body, was a veritable crank upon the subject. He said: "There is neither a starting nor stopping point to it, nor any necessity for it, so let the nonsense alone and use your brains for more worthy subjects."

Or in the language of one, who, when in the body, was second to no statesman in the world: "During my fifty years in spirit world I have made a thorough study of these questions, and I find no necessity for believing them. I know they are false; let them alone."

C. I. CRITCHETT.

CLINTON, IA.

Mt. Pleasant Park Camp-Meeting.

August 24 witnessed the closing of one of the most successful camp-meetings the Mississippi Valley Spiritualists Association has ever held. While the attendance was not quite as great, perhaps, as in some past years, it was surprisingly good when bad weather and other unfavorable conditions affecting all camps are taken into consideration. A handsome balance in our treasury after all running expenses were paid, evidences the improved and improving state of the association's affairs.

There is always in every camp a disgruntled element that incessantly predicts failure and disaster, and accuses the management not only of all sorts of mismanagement, but of all the failings and crimes in the catalogue of inefficiency and immorality, but intelligent people are beginning to recognize the earmarks peculiar to this species of the genus homo, and to pay little attention to its mouthings.

Mt. Pleasant Park Camp is on the up-grade, all assertions and predictions to the contrary notwithstanding. The local organization of Clinton, the Philosophical Society of Spiritualists, furnished this year a number of new members for the association—members who would be a credit to any organization, and who are with us to stay, and help work out the salvation of Spiritualism in this "neck o' woods."

With an efficient corps of officers; with our indebtedness less than $500, and growing less every year; with the most beautiful camp-grounds in all the West, we have every reason to feel confident of future successes beyond anything yet realized. The officers reelected are Prof. W. F. Peck, of St. Louis, president; Mrs. Emma J. Knowles, Clinton, Iowa, vice-president. New officers, Mrs. Mollie B. Anderson, Clarksville, Mo., secretary; Mrs. Christine Cooper, Clinton, Iowa, treasurer; Will M. Kellogg and Max Hoffmann, trustees.

The speakers and mediums who delighted our audiences in varied ways were Hon. H. D. Barrett, Prof. W. F. Peck, Miss Lizzie Harlow, Mrs. Georgia G. Cooley, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, Mrs. Jennie Hagan Brown, Mrs. Maggie Waite, Mrs. Albright, Max Hoffmann, and last but not least, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates; an array of talent of which we are justly proud. Most excellent vocal music was furnished during the entire season by Prof. and Mrs. Paul Zumbach, of St. Paul, Minn., accompanied by their beautiful and talented daughter, Miss Carrie, and assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Kirby, Prof. Peck, Miss Grace Hawtin, Miss Bicklehaupt, Dr. Friedman and others.

Prof. Zumbach and wife and daughter have been with us during the past four camp seasons, singing their way into our hearts until we look forward each year to their coming as a necessary part of camp life.

The same may be said of Prof. Adolf Wiese, of Clinton, and his fine orchestra. Prof. Wiese is truly the musician par excellence in his line; has been here three seasons, and we shall hope to have him with us next year.

Saturday, August 23, Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, president of the Wisconsin State Association, addressed a large audience in behalf of the Morris Pratt Institute, and met with a hearty and substantial response to her plea for the education of our coming public workers, through the establishment and maintenance of the Morris Pratt Institute. With head and heart and enthusiasm in her work, Mrs. Stewart is certainly the right woman in the right place.

The Ladies' Auxiliary to the M. V. S. A., the Woman's Union, is officered for the coming year by Mrs. Emma J. Knowles, Clinton, Ia., president; Mrs. M. L. Woods, St. Louis, Mo., vice-president; Retta P. Davenport, Chicago, secretary; Christine Cooper, Clinton, Ia., treasurer; Elizabeth Harding, Clinton, Ia.; Mrs. R. E. Rowantree, Clinton, Ia.; Mrs. R. M. Stanton, New Sharon, Iowa, trustees.

The good work done by the Union during the camp-meeting just closed, added much to the social enjoyment of visitors and members, and supplied a great deal of pleasant entertainment for all, besides contributing handsomely to the finances of the association. "A Trip Around the World," on Aug. 11; Woman's Day, Aug. 13, with several tea parties during the month, were some of the features of the Woman's Union work.

The harmony that has prevailed among the members of the Union for several years is the subject of much favorable comment and congratulation, and furnishes a key to the secret of good work accomplished.

Our newly appointed superintendent of grounds, J. C. Blodgett, is an old and respected Spiritualist, a resident of Mt. Pleasant Park, and a man calculated to fill the important office of superintendent with credit to the association, and satisfaction to the public generally.

The retiring superintendent, L. M. Rose, declined to serve longer. He takes with him to his new field of labor the kindest remembrance of many friends.

Feeling that the blessings of the spirit world attend our efforts for the advancement of truthms embodied in Spiritualism, we go forward hopefully and confidently to the accomplishment of another year's work which will culminate in a still more successful camp-meeting in the summer of 1903.

EMMA J. KNOWLES.

Ottawa Camp, Kans.

Ottawa (Kans.) Spiritualists closed a ten days session August 31. It was one of the grandest camp meetings ever held in Kansas. Visitors gathered from all points, far and near to shake hands with friends and receive rich blessings from the spirit world. The association was fortunate to obtain the gifted and talented speakers and mediums they did. Perfect harmony prevailed. The speakers were H. H. Benson and Mrs. Lull, each with force and logic entwined their pure thoughts around each one. Mrs. Seaman, Bledsoe's inspirational lectures are grand. Her independent slate-writing and tests are as great as her lectures.

A. Scott Bledsoe, president of the National State Spiritualist Association, Topeka, Kans., was our leading speaker. His easy manner and masterly logic won the hearts of his hearers.

The mediums did some good work. Mrs. Lull's platform tests are excellent. Mrs. Inez Wagner's ballot readings were more popular than ever. From 25 to 30 tests were given each evening, and all recognized. Her trumpet seances are remarkable. Mrs. Bartell's materializing seances were unquestionable and always crowded. W. W. Aber was there for one evening only, giving one of his noted seances to a large crowd.

Our cause is rapidly growing, and a deep interest is manifested. The heart quickened as farewells were spoken, and all hoped for a reunion at beautiful Forest Park next year. They had reelection of officers, for the ensuing year, retaining W. H. Henderson for president. With this zealous worker to the front, success is assured.

MISS MAY COOK.
Spring Hill, Kans.

Vicksburg Camp, Mich.

The nineteenth annual camp-meeting has passed into history, and it may be recorded as one of the most successful meetings that has ever been held in Fraser's grove. Everything has been in perfect harmony from start to finish and all who came into our midst as message bearers have been enabled to give us the highest and best truths as they received them from the fountain of life divine.

Dr. Julia Walton, of Jackson, came to our camp Tuesday forenoon just in time to assist in the morning conference and make ready for the afternoon lecture. This is Dr. Walton's first visit to our camp and we find her a woman of great culture and refinement, receiving only the highest and best inspiration.

Thursday was Woman's Day, and everything took on a touch of yellow, denoting greater wisdom which all are seeking. A conference was held at ten o'clock, at which time the "enfranchisement of women" was energetically discussed by both men and women, showing that the management of Vicksburg camp believe in equal rights.

At 2 o'clock essays were read and speeches made by Mrs. Walton, Mr. Burdick, Mrs. Klauser and Miss Fuller. A good social time was enjoyed in the evening with music, recitations and games.

Rev. B. F. Austin arrived Friday and delivered an address in the afternoon, in his usual energetic and enthusiastic manner, which inspires his hearers to be up and at work at furthering the cause which brings light and life into our homes.

Mr. Austin also gave talks on "The Power of Thought" which were very instructive.

Saturday forenoon was devoted to conference. Afternoon, lecture by Mr. Austin, and in the evening Joseph King gave a seance for camp benefit, which was well attended.

The fourth and last Sunday was like all the others, a perfect day. Nature did her best toward making the meeting a success, and a large audience was in attendance at the morning lecture by Dr. Walton, whose ideas are always of a high order, impressing us with a desire to live a true spiritual life.

There was an increased attendance in the afternoon. Rev. B. F. Austin was at his best, choosing for his subject, "Jesus and Spiritualism." He said that he has a better understanding of the teachings of Jesus since he has come into the beautiful truths of Spiritualism. Many remained for the evening meeting to hear the closing address of the season by Mr. Austin, and so closed our meetings for this season with peace and good will toward all.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. R. FRANCIS,

"THE UNKNOWN"
—BY—
CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. Price $2.00.

DR. C. E. WATKINS,

THE WONDERFUL

CHRONIST.

John King, M. D., the great writer and authority on Chronic Diseases, says that a Chronist is one who cures CHRONIC DISEASE. This being the case, then Dr. Watkins is certainly a CHRONIST, because he CURES chronic disease. Does not doctor, patch up, but cures. Do you desire to be cured? Let us reason together. You have been suffering for years trying this "Doctor," and that "Physician," and in spite of strong, drastic drugs given to you in toxic doses you still live. Well, this fact should teach you that nature is stronger than disease. This being the case, now, don't you think if some one who has been a closer student of nature than you have, should teach you what nature wants you to do to get well, that it would help you to recover your health? And then again, if you should place yourself in the hands of a Chronist, who uses only nature's remedies and laws to to cure disease, don't you think you would have a better chance to get well? Let us see what Dr. Watkins says about nature being the real Physician. Let us see what a Chronist who cures Chronic disease says. Remember, kind friend, that these words are the words of a regular Graduate of Medicine, but who was never guilty of trying to make nature obey the medical books and the opinions of medical men, but are the words of one who is now only a Student of nature. Write him today for his book on Chronic Disease which will be sent you free.

LAKE BRADY, O.

The New Lake Brady Spiritual Camp.

Many of your readers are no doubt aware that the old Lake Brady camp is dead, and it is hoped its sorrows are buried with it. I am told that enough of earthly means and labor of twelve years were sunk in its enterprise to have made one of the best spiritual camps in the country. This seems sad to all lovers interested in Spiritual work.

The undertaking seems to have been too much for its management. Of this, however, I can not unerringly speak. But out of the ashes of the old the new shall rise, and from the errors there made, lessons shall have been learned to make failure of this new enterprise impossible.

Having been a frequent visitor to this new site I consider it far superior to the old, being roomier, having about 14 acres in its boundary all of which is to be used for a spiritual camp ground. One-half of this is cleared ground, while the other half is a thick growth of maple wood, the whole lying on a hill side and directly opposite the old camp—a most delightful spot. The part that is cleared is to be cut up into lots for cottages, while in the center of the woods is to be built an auditorium about where the tent is now. The old camp had but a huge shed set down in one corner in a hole to answer for a lecture hall, while there were something like 50 acres of ground which could not be paid for, at a big price. Besides, the spiritual part of the enterprise was the smallest part of it, the rest being used for a summer resort, picnics and a roustabout place for everybody, not at all suited and in keeping or in harmony with spiritual work, so that neither was successful. The old grounds have now been leased by outsiders and much improved, they having put up a fine large theatre where something is going on every evening, improved the bathing facilities, put up electric lights, a fine new steamer for the lake, improved the hotel, together with many other things necessary for a first-class summer resort. I speak of this as being rather a help to the spiritual campers who, when wishing diversity of thought, and tire at times from the routine of camp life, have but to step across the road and find plenty of amusement to gladden the earthly desires of this life, or may stop at this fine hotel. I must say that strictly temperance privileges prevail and good order is the rule.

The campers' cottages on the old ground number about 40 or 50, in good condition, and will mostly be moved to the new grounds when ready.

I have been asked to say that this 14 acres of new territory will cost $2,000 if paid for by October 1, this year. Of this amount $1,500 is in sight, partly in cash and balance in subscription, while the balance, $500, is as sure to materialize as that we are alive. This is certain then.

The present mangement has adopted the safest method of doing business on earth and that is, no more debts, pay-as-you-go-plan. Past experiences have proved disastrous. So after October, when this new site shall become the property of the Lake Brady Spiritual Association, I am told a nice fat little sum is promised from somewhere, I am not to give name (this being a philanthropic secret), and will be judiciously spent in building an auditorium and beautifying the grounds.

So, Mr. Editor and kind readers, by next year or a little later, the friends of Lake Brady camp will find that Spiritualism here is not dead nor dying, as has been rumored, but more alive than ever, O, no; there are too many warm material hearts and generous souls here for it to die. There is no death to truth.

The present management desires to express its thanks to all who have so generously given from out their purse, and also to those who have lent a helping hand to further this new enterprise. It also extends a hearty welcome to all to come and see the new camp next year, where good talent and cheer have held forth this year and there will be more next. So come and bring your friends, and hear the truth as given from the higher forces.

I have forgotten to state that the camp is now accessible by trolley car line from Cleveland, Kent, Akron and many smaller towns, besides the Cleveland and Pittsburg railroad.

The success of the camp is due mostly to its present board, Mr. and Mrs. Holle, Mr. and Mrs. Keck, Mr. and Mrs. Hawn, and Mrs. Diebolt. Everyone connected with the camp is joyful and happy at its fine prospects. May their efforts and anticipations be more than realized. All success to the New Lake Brady Spiritual Camp.

PURE SPIRITUALISM.

When Shall We See Its Shining Glory?

When Spiritualism shall shine as the silver stars, or manifest its glory as the bright shining of the sun, will be just when men and women "so love the world" as did the Nazarene—when they will, as he did, give their very lives for the world!

Give their lives and their labors as freely for the spread of the truths of Spiritualism as do the Christians to-day for the spread of their half-truths!

Consider the following and give all credit to the bravery of a woman. Twenty-five years ago the first Presbyterian mission was established in Alaska. Some one was needed there to take charge of affairs of course. A woman, "on five days' notice, accepted this post, where she was willing to remain alone, the only white woman in the country," where were but few white men indeed, and she "heroically served Christ as minister, teacher, magistrate, nurse and undertaker!"

Think of it a moment, the one only white woman in bleak and distant Alaska, shouldering that task within five days, for the love of her faith, and then with all reverence cry, "Glory to Mrs. McFarland!"

Spiritualists claim to have more of the truth than any other people. Personally, I do not believe its truth to differ in any degree from that taught by Jesus the carpenter, but I do not believe the Christian Church of to-day is teaching the truth he did. But there must be something yet wrong with sweet Spiritualism, for it does not seem to warm up the heart of humanity to the degree that the half-truths of orthodoxy do for those who accept them. Where is the Spiritualist, man or woman, who twenty-five years ago would have buried herself in the frozen, unknown depth of Alaska, that they might carry the truth of life, love and religion to the Indians of that region?

Don't you see where the trouble is? We, unlike the denominations, have no trained teachers of the faith! There are beautiful speakers and orators, men and women, but we sit under the charm of their rhetoric for entertainment rather than instruction. There is and must be a genuine basis to Spiritualism, and I think it should be the duty of every confessed Spiritualist to know exactly what they do believe, and why they believe it, and be able to give a reason for the faith, or hope or belief that is in them!

Spiritualism has conquered death, eliminating death has in simple reality prolonged life by removing the suggestion that life can be destroyed. Life is prolonged, trials made lighter to bear, loneliness is abolished, even solitary confinement may be made companionable, health is benefited, and present happiness made permanent as we realize that the Now is wisdom, and wisdom is not found by preaching of the good in the Future. Are these blessings not worth handing on? If there is joy and blessing and good tidings in Spiritualism for you and for me, there must be the same gladness in it for every one on earth, saint, sinner and savage!

To see Spiritualism shine as the stars over all the world, its truths must be told to all the world, just as ardent Christians have told what they considered the truth. Spiritualism, to reach its place of power must work, so far as I can see, just as Christianity has done. To win the world we must go right into the world. Establish little missions here and there, where not so many lovely lectures shall be given, as plain truths taught—what is right and what is wrong, and why it is right or wrong. Establish Houses of Helpfulness where the brotherhood-of-man idea shall be exemplified in living reality. Do the works that Jesus did as he did them. Give spiritual healings and spiritual advice as he did, free of price. Take ideas of help to mankind, and usefulness to this part of the universe from the Salvation Army. Work for the advancement of Spiritualism as the churches work for their growth, and then you may see what Spiritualism can do for the world! And then, oh my sister and my brother, then you will see the greatness and glory of the Scripture-promised Millennium!

Lake Brady Camp, O.

On Wednesday, Aug. 27, D. A. Herrick gave his last trumpet seance at Lake Brady for this season. There was the usual good attendance, for they always have good results.

On Thursday, the ladies served a chicken supper from 4 to 6, which was largely attended and netted them a neat little sum. At 8 the same evening, Mrs. Carpenter held a seance for the benefit of the Lake Brady camp, which was a success in every way. Saturday was memorial Day, with appropriate services. Mrs. Carpenter read the beautiful poem, "There Is No Death," and made an opening address. After others had made some remarks befitting the occasion, Mrs. Carpenter gave messages from bouquets that many had placed on the stand.

Sunday, August 31, was the last day of the Lake Brady Camp. The weather was perfect, the attendance large, and Mrs. Carpenter's lectures were all that one could desire. Mrs. Carpenter gave messages after each lecture.

The camp has had a very successful season, much beyond the expectation of the management, as they had no funds to start with. Every bill has been paid and a balance left in the treasury. The money is all subscribed with which to purchase the grounds, which will be done by October 1. Quite a number of lots have already been selected on which to build cottages. The outlook for the future prosperity of Lake Brady camp is brighter than ever before.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Mrs. C. P. Nash, wife of Rev. C. P. Nash, Universalist, passed to the higher life, very suddenly, of neuralgia of the heart, on the morning of the 2d inst. She became a pronounced Spiritualist in 1900, and adhered firmly to that faith to the end of her earth life. She was one of the early subscribers to The Progressive Thinker when that paper was established, and has an unexpired subscription still standing to her credit. She prized the paper very highly, and lived rejoicingly from day to day under the inspiration of its teachings. She lived 71 years, 7 months and 19 days on earth; and leaves a husband, three children, twelve grandchildren, and one great grand child as earthly survivors. Her home had been for nine years past in Holly, Mich.

Waldo Bassett departed for a higher life, at Cripple Creek, Col., where he had taken up his residence in hopes of regaining his health. The remains were brought to the home of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Orlado Bassett, Milan, Ohio, where the funeral was held August 20. The family one and all are Spiritualists. He was instructed in the Progressive Lyceum, and became an honored member of the community. His devoted wife was sustained during his distressing sickness by the presence of spirit friends, and they materially assisted her in alleviating his sufferings.

Hudson Tuttle was called to officiate. He said that he came to lift the minds of the mourning friends from the oppressive sense of the great injustice and cruelty that seemed to have been wrought by the death of the departed, to the mountain summit, where, overlooking all causes and effects, they would feel how little of existence was this mortal life, for there would be a thousand fold compensation. There was a large assembly of sympathizing friends, and a great profusion of flowers. The remains were deposited in the cemetery where rests his ancestors, a lovely place among the "Beautiful Hills of Milan," of which Mrs. Page—Edison's sister—has sung. ***

Departed for a higher life, at her home in Elyria, Ohio, August 18, Mrs. Mary Arnold, wife of George Arnold. The funeral was held at the home, August 21, Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle giving a beautiful service in reading, and Hudson Tuttle the discourse. Mr. Arnold is well known as proprietor of the Elyria and Birmingham Planing Mills, and has for his long life been devoted to the belief which now sustains him with its staff of assurance.

WHY BE SICK?

Dr. J. M. Peebles the Famous Physician and Scientist Has Perfected a System of Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Sufferer.

Read His Valuable Book, "A Message of Hope"—It will Explain to You His Wonderful Treatment and Tell You How You Can be Healed.

Why will you continue to suffer when there is a treatment at hand that will cure you? Dr. Peebles and his associates, all physicians of wide experience and reputation, have perfected a system of treatment that promises health and strength to all.

J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D.

Many of their cures seem almost like miracles, for hundreds of those restored had traveled far and wide, trying this doctor and that, without getting any relief and were about to give up in despair when they began the treatment of Dr. Peebles.

They are able to do such wonderful cures because they work in harmony with nature, and employ her mighty healing forces in connection with mild, scientifically prepared medicinal remedies. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the depleted system, enriches the blood, improves digestion and assimilation, gives strength and tone to weakened nerves and muscles, and permanently repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing thousands of the sick to rejoice at being healed.

Why don't you sit down, at once, and write the doctors a plain, truthful letter as to your condition as you see it? If you will do this, they will carefully examine your case and send you a full diagnosis of your condition, and tell you truthfully whether or not they can cure you. This will cost you nothing, and if they find they can cure you, they will make their charges so small that anyone can afford the treatment.

If you are sick, write them at once for their full diagnosis and professional advice which will be sent without charge, together with their wonderful book, "A Message of Hope," which will explain fully this grand system of treatment and give you information that will brighten the remainder of your life. Epilepsy Cured.

At Last a Positive and Permanent Cure for This Terrible Maladay Is Discovered.

The renowned Brain and Nerve Specialist, Dr. Charles W. Green, of Battle Creek, Mich., has at last found a positive cure for Epilepsy, or Fits.

Epilepsy has baffled the medical world since the time of Hippocrates, and not until the Eminent Specialist, Dr. Green, patiently worked out his great cure has a positive cure for Epilepsy been known. The Doctor has used it in every case of fits he has treated in the past five years, hundreds of whom had tried everything they could hear of before taking his treatment, and he has yet to find the case, not due to injury, that it will not cure.

Mrs. Lizzie Green, of Boston, says: I cannot thank you enough for my deliverance from that terrible disease, Epilepsy. I had suffered with it for thirty years and had tried everything I could hear of, but the attacks only grew harder and more frequent. I had given up all hope when one of my neighbors told me of your great cure. I should not have written this if she had not urged me, for I had been fooled so often that I had resolved to pay out no more money. God bless her for urging me for you cured me and saved me from a life worse than death." Do not experiment longer with "Free Cures" and worthless nostrums containing injurious hypnotics, etc., but write at once to Dr. Charles W. Green, 214 Monroe St., Battle Creek, Mich., for full particulars of this great and tried remedy. It will cure you and brighten the end of your life. Write at once giving full facts about your case; the doctor will tell you exactly what can be done for you. Remember the treatment is positively guaranteed.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

OTHER PEOPLE'S ILLS.

Some Very Interesting Reflections Thereon.

A prominent business man [Globe-Democrat] recently sprained his back by some rash stroke in athletics and came home to his wife more or less disabled for life. When her sympathy grew tearful he assured her that there was scarcely a man of his acquaintance not largely the worse for some such physical injury. This seemed to comfort them both, and the disaster to the spinal column became a secondary consideration.

The philosophy is as old as humanity, and about as curious. Why it should comfort a man with a broken back to know that another man's back is broken it is not easy to say. But apparently it does, though heaven is not the legitimate outcome of such a philosophy. Indeed Swedenborg seems to be its true interpreter when he tells us that the good Lord, out of his tender mercy, provides "the hells" where, as it were, people of broken backs and lame limbs in morals can get together and enjoy what Plutarch calls the comfort of society in shipwreck. Meantime to educate us up to it is the part of much of the instruction offered from the very nursery in the line of comforting reflections upon the sins and miseries of other people.

That we are all poor sinners is a relief that theology itself offers to the strain of that deeper cry, Be merciful to me a sinner, though nothing in all the history of ethics can show that one human soul has been helped by it. Poets and philosophers of course of all ages have tried to make suffering as the common lot the bases of individual endurance, though how the grandeur of that endurance was helped by it none of them could declare to us. Pliny beneath the belching fires of Vesuvius tells us that he found his "miserable consolation" in the belief that it was the end of the world and all mankind was perishing with him, and in their secret souls all these great ones know that it is but a "miserable consolation" which can come to any creature out of the sufferings of others. That it is closely akin to pleasure in these sufferings some of the more honest of them would seem to have made out in their reflections upon our poor mortality. "I am convinced," says Burke, "that we have a degree of delight, and that no small one, in the real misfortunes and pains of others," and that odious maxim maker, Rochefoucauld, even goes farther and declares that "in the adversity of our best friends we always find something which is not wholly displeasing to us."

What more could all Hades ask than that to found its hells upon! And yet it is not an unnatural deduction from the accepted principle that misery loves company and finds its own ground of endurance in it. Indeed, the fear that our friends through too much prosperity will get out of the reach of us and our misfortunes is the gentlest explanation that is made of the hideous maxim, and the desire to bind them to us even in the bond of common woes is not largely discountenanced by the philosophers. In truth, community in suffering, perhaps in despair of community in joy, is so largely a part of poor mortals' demand upon each other that scarcely God could come to earth without declaring himself a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. Pains, wrongs and all manner of ills are borne patiently if a whole community shares them together, and age, decay, death and oblivion are to be held tolerable, because, as one of our own poets puts it, "All that breathe shall share the destiny." The crowning bitterness of life everywhere grows out of its inequalities, and half the fires of war, anarchy and rebellion are kindled less for the pain men suffer, which in default of contrast they do not so much consider, as for fury of the fact that others refuse to bear it with them—push out of the common lot to what they deem the uncommon.

Some soul in fire that could look up and honestly rejoice that another soul was lying at peace in Abraham's bosom, and scorn the consolation that one creature was left to suffer with him, might revolutionize the whole scheme of purgatorial pains in earth or hades and show the angels a height of greatness that they are not competent to attain. Of course, teachers and mystics of different ages have sighted this glory afar off, and some of the blessed martyrs made a fair grasp for it, but one person alone really descended into hell to teach men the universal love that alone could compass it. For love and love alone is the secret of rising above any consolation in others' afflictions which the odiously discerning philosophers find in us, and every true household is a proof of it. Imagine a son comforting himself over a fractured spine because his father or brother was similarly afflicted! Picture a fond mother finding consolation in the decay of her charms through beholding that a beautiful daughter was fading with her. Try Rochefaucauld's maxim on friends who had reached the Damon and Pythias stage of affection. Everywhere it is the poverty and dearth of love which that consolation of a common lot in sorrow builds upon, and one touch of the fire of a true affection shivers it at a breath.

Let universal love "lie like a shaft of light across the land" and all men's good be each men's care, and there will be small comfort in knowing that pains and bruises are spread over the whole race. Even that incentive to courage which is supposed to lodge in the idea that if others have suffered and endured you can, is a small matter beside the strength of treading the wine press alone and rejoicing that others know nothing of its crimson deeps. Indeed, the truth of the matter is that it is one of our greatest misfortunes, instead of gains, that we are so tangled up in other people's lives that we can scarcely have the toothache without setting a whole family in commotion. To find a place where we could have it out with ourselves when our souls faltered or our limbs failed would be much better than calling in a whole army of the halt and maimed to suffer with us. The lad in the mourners' seat who reproved the boy behind him for crying when it was "none of his funeral" had a measure of the right spirit in him after all. Sympathy may be well enough for the sympathizer, but strength to abide without it is better for the sufferer.

Most of all the form of consolation which looks upon the ten thousand woes and evils that men bring upon themselves as but a part of the common lot, as it were appointed of heaven, is the thing that blights. Heaven never asks any man to fracture his anatomy at either work or play, and if he does, it is small business to charge it to the general order and so pervert the kindlier ends of being. Pain is, as all the teachers tell us, the child of wrong doing somewhere, and to dispose of it as far as possible by right doing is certainly better than to declare it universal and take consolation in the worst form of it. Really joy is the only thing that men can afford to dwell upon as common, and it is significant that it was when the woman in the Bible had found, not lost, her piece of silver that she is made to call in the friends and neighbors to sympathize with her. It is due to our misconception of life and its true bonds that sympathy and the "common lot" mean ever something dolorous, and that people scarcely think of them save in connection with some misfortune or damage to the original.

EPIGRAMS ON WOMAN.

There's a sadness in her sadness when she's sad,
There's a gladness in her gladness when she's glad,
But her sadness when she's sad,
Or her gladness when she's glad,
Isn't in it with her madness when she's mad.
—Anonymous.

Oh, the shrewdness of their shrewdness when they're shrewd,
And the rudeness of their rudeness when they're rude;
But the shrewdness of their shrewdness and the rudeness of their rudeness
Are as nothing to their goodness when they're good.
—Notes and Queries.

SPIRIT MESSAGE,

Given through the Mediumship of Dr. C. H. Brown.

Mr. Chas. H. Mathews, Dear Friend:—Having the opportunity to communicate, I feel that I would be very unjust to disregard this grand privilege. Having been spirit life many years, and no opportunity having presented itself through which I could communicate, it is quite needless for me to say that I grasp this opportunity with alacrity. You will no doubt be glad to hear from one who has long since been forgotten by many, especially those who relieve themselves by thinking that I had gone to that bourne from whence there is no possibility of return. But, my dear friend, I am very much pleased to be able to inform you through the instrumentality of this medium, that such is not the case; and I still live, and what to me is a pleasing theme to know, is, that there is no death.

Upon passing from the material life, we are only born into a new life, a more superior or ethereal state of existence. I am exceedingly happy that such is the case. My friends, the All-wise Father created you for a higher purpose than to pass a few short years in material life and then cease to longer exist. All is life and progression, and I find upon entering spirit life, I entered the sphere which I was best fitted to occupy; and let me say, it pays to live in readiness. Had I a better understanding of the realities, I would no doubt have been better prepared to leave earth life. It pays, I repeat, to live honest, consistent lives, and by so doing it will save you from a vast amount of humiliation and chagrin. Having got rid of the body, I saw myself just as I was in my true light, which was not at all pleasing. To be sure I had lived what I considered a consistent life. I had went strictly according to my highest conception of right. I had been closely allied to the Churches and Sunday Schools. I looked upon Jesus as being the embodiment of goodness and saving principle, and I thoroughly believed him to be divine. But my dear Mathews, such is not the case, and I found out to my sorrow that I had been laboring under a delusion all of my life. Christ's teachings were all right and good; but he is no more divine than you are divine; one partakes just as much of divinity as the other.

When we look upon Christ as a Savior; that in order to inherit eternal life, we must lay our burdens on him, it is a mistake. Jesus Christ is no more of a Savior than any other good man; no more so than Wendell Phillips, Robert G. Ingersoll or Henry Ward Beecher. Upon entering spirit life I did really expect to immediately see Jesus; but I have not seen him yet, and I have hunted for him long; and had I not ceased I would to-day be groveling in darkness. While I was looking for him and the throne, I was all the time letting my better interests go unheeded. I came to my senses after awhile, and am now on my road to a higher state of progression. My good friends, leave Jesus to take care of himself, and he is amply able to do it. Rid yourselves, my old brothers and sisters in the churches, of that terrible delusion and idiosyncrasy, and work out your own salvation. You must save yourselves if ever you are saved. Be your own savior and walk in the light. Use the blessed organ of reason, which God has given to light the paths of his children, and you will then begin to prepare yourselves for higher spheres. Not wishing to tax the medium too much I will close for a time, but will promise to come again.

Your old friend and lover of Truth.
JOHN JUDY.

THE SCHOOL OF LIFE.

Experiences and Lessons of Mortal Life.

Several years ago I wrote a series of essays on the subject Experiences and Lessons of Mortal Life; and I have often intended to copy and revise them for The Progressive Thinker, which I have delayed. For the greater part of the thoughts expressed in these essays I give the spirit guides credit. The ethical and philosophical principles handed down to us by our spirit teachers are far superior to the doctrines of all old religious systems, mixed with errors, tinctured with the God idea.

Christian believers are wont to question: "Since you are opposed to the Christian religion what does your Spiritualism offer in place of it?" If such inquirers give attention to these chapters they will understand what our celestial teachers offer in the way of ethical philosophy and its practical utility in the school of life. It needs no priest nor parson to explain it.

From the cradle to the grave all humanity longs to be what it is not to-day. The little child watches in play the older children and tries to imitate them. All great achievements are the results of ambitious thought. Thus humanity plods along through the earth plane, hoping to-morrow will bring brighter results than to-day. The soul is ever ambitious to unfold more and more in its beauty and achievements all along the line of life—its ideality in advance of its environment, which makes the incentive, to struggle on. All have aspirations, which are the product of the divine within that is seeking constant expression.

Ideals are as important to us as reals, for ideals shape the world of achievement. What we want to be governs our steps and our course. Our love, ambition, desire and aspiration lead and shape us more than the forces of heredity or the circumstances around us. Man's highest idea of himself is mystery. We never realize nor fully comprehend what we are, and never will. In the progress of life we are going ever onward without limit. We cannot die, nor can we stand still; we cannot retrace the steps of our early pilgrimage; we must move forward and upward forever.

We are born with organisms and faculties filled with longings, desires, passions and powers for which we are not responsible; yet no intelligence less than infinite can judge how far a person may be individually responsible for his or her thoughts and acts. We are not responsible—as we understand the term—for many of our thoughts and acts; but will have to bear the consequences of them, and also the consequences of the thoughts and acts of some of our fellow-beings.

He who puts his hand into the fire burns it.

He who wilfully or unconsciously violates any mandate of nature must suffer the consequences.

The result is the same in both cases.

In some instances the cause of suffering may not rest with the individual, but may be traced back to ancestry, and wherever the cause may rest, it is in exact accordance with the operation of law. We find that human beings suffer because they do not live in accordance with natural rules—they violate that which is laid down by nature as the correct method and conduct of life.

We would not remove the stumbling blocks from man's way in search of light—they are needed for his development. The long road and the hard road is for him who needs it. If we master the lessons that are given us to learn, we shall finally go forth to stand on the summit of eternal truth.

In the future life fitness determines spheres, and we shall gravitate to the place for which we are prepared. The man put into a sphere of bliss beyond his development, can have no appreciation of its delights.

Heaven is for such as have grown to it; not by miraculous gift, prayer, or free grace, but by assiduous self-culture and the long and often painful discipline of events. In this lower world but few accomplish and enjoy that which they desire and deserve, hence the world is filled with failures and sorrows.

If the inharmony within us produces results, its teachings are designed to make us more harmonious. We must meet the trials of life, yet we can by course and make for ourselves better conditions. The requirements of a true life are fully met when a person lives up to hi osr her highest conceptions of right, truth, duty, justice.

Looking only on external forms of existence, we behold imperfections in all, but there is always an imperfect before there can be a perfect manifestation of any design.

Errors have often left a shadow, a weight, a feeling of regret; but no mistake should be remembered as anything more than a temporary failure. That which is not perfect is not fit to survive. If a condition brings suffering it is because it is not perfect, and it must be removed or outgrown. The doctrine of "the survival of the fittest" applies to everything of a progressive nature. Suffering resulting from error is purifying, and when the errors are rectified there is no longer any need for suffering. If we make no mistakes we will not have to suffer; but having made them, suffering should be regarded as the way out of the difficulty. Viewed in that light, suffering is merciful; the curse is removed.

We are taught by observation and experience that suffering seems to be the natural result of progress and evolution; that is, one gains experience through the discipline of life, and as he unfolds from a state of ignorance to one of knowledge he gains this unfoldment in part from the suffering it entails upon him from the consequences of mistakes and failures along the path of life; yet as one gains knowledge and attains understanding how to apply his powers to practical and good results and purposes, his sufferings decrease, because he realizes how to live in accordance with natural law and to make the most of the opportunities. He is confident of the results which come from earnest labor, from sincere and honest purpose and effort. He (or she) who makes efforts to advance along the lines of progress, who endeavors to unfold his qualities of self-reliance, of endurance and of patience along with other attributes of a mental and spiritual nature, will be able to hold his own ground of harmony and strength—he will labor from day to day with a strong reliant will, certain of success in what is good and great at any cost, and as he advances he will gain knowledge of his own powers, gain a self-poise that will be of inestimable value to him, and he will unfold more and more in spirituality as he presses onward.

SPIRITUALISM IN TEXAS.

It Is Rapidly Coming to the Front.

The sixth annual meeting of the Texas State National Association of Modern Spiritualists will be held at the Spiritualist temple, on 14th and Post-office streets, on Sept. 5, 6, 7 and 8. Mr. John W. Ring, of this city, president of the association, expects an attendance of about 30 members. The convention will be called to order at 10 o'clock Friday morning and there will be three sessions held daily after that. On Sunday morning at 11 o'clock M. D. Tenney, of League City, will be ordained a minister of the gospel of modern spiritualism and at 8 o'clock Sunday evening there will be a christening, but instead of water, flowers will be used. Special choir music has been arranged for the meeting. On Sept. 8 services will be held on the beach at sundown and flowers will be strewn on the waves of the gulf in memory of those who passed away in the great storm.

According to President Ring modern spiritualism is now in its fifty-fifth year. It originated at Hydesville, N. Y., on March 31, 1848, by the famous Fox sisters, Kate, Margaret and Leah. The first national body of spiritualists was organized Sept. 20, 1893. The Texas association was organized in San Antonio May 3, 1897, and the local society was organized May 5, 1895.

There are 22 state organizations affiliated with the national organization, representing approximately 30,000 active members. There are about 1,000 active members of the state organization and the local society has a membership of 75. In computing the active members of the spiritualist societies only those who pay dues are accounted members. Though a whole family may be spiritualists and all the members thereof attend the meetings and believe in the doctrines taught the society counts only the head of the family, or the ones thereof who pay dues as being members.

There are only two local societies in the state which have temples, as the meeting houses of spiritualists are called. These two are Fort Worth and Galveston, though Dallas has a large building fund now on hand and expects to erect a temple within a short while. The local temple is on 24th and Post-office and was purchased some time ago for about $7,000. Besides the large building, which was formerly St. John's Methodist church, the local society owns three full lots of ground and has two dwelling houses rented.

"Modern spiritualism recognizes all Bibles, all creeds," said Mr. Ring this morning. "We believe there is good in the Christian Bible, good in the Koran, good in the Vedas, the book of Buddha good in the Iris and other books of Egyptian teachings, and good in every creed, every religion which teaches man to be of a higher order, to hope for things after death.

"We accept the life of Christ, rather than his death, as the Savior and believe more inspiration and more comfort can be derived from studying the glories of his living than can be gotten from grieving over his tragic end.

"We believe in an infinite intelligence. We believe that the phenomena of nature, physical and spiritual, are the expressions of infinite intelligence. We affirm that a correct understanding of such expression, and living in accordance therewith, constitutes the true religion. We affirm that the existence and personal identity of the individual continue after the change called death. We affirm that communication with the so-called dead is a fact, scientifically proven by the phenomena of spiritualism.

We believe that after the change induced by death that a person will follow the same inclinations, the same bents in the spirit world he follows in this world. If his inclinations are for good, in spirit life he will be good, if for bad, he will not be good. If he is a hard drinker his first inclination after the waking from death will be to get a drink, if he is temperate here he will be temperate there. But we believe in the ultimate redemption of every soul.

"We do not appeal to a man's passions—to his heart. Spiritualism is a belief, or religion of the mind. It appeals to one's reason and holds out neither fear of punishment nor hope of reward for all, whether they affiliate with the spiritualistic societies or not will enter this future life. In the future life one's state is either heaven or hell, according to his own making, or may chance according to circumstances, just like it is on earth. But there is a pleasant destiny awaiting all."

SUGGESTIVE THOUGHTS.

The Constellations—A Bit of Personal Experience.

I have been much interested in an article in The Progressive Thinker of August 30, under the title, "Two Discoveries." Especially was I pleased with that part referring to Samson.

The original of Samson is Shem-shem which signifies the sun in his double character of power and weakness. His strength is in his hair and the sun's strength in his rays. The seven locks of his hair wherein lay his strength are the seven summer months which are shorn from him while sleeping in the lap of Delilah or Virgo.

The sun passes through this constellation in the month of October, and here he loses his strength.

Eve seduced Adam after she had been seduced by the serpent, and thus secured his fall.

By looking at a map of the heavens it will be discovered that the constellation Bootes, originally called Adham, is preceded by Virgo, with the Serpent's or Hydra's head nearly a constellation ahead of her. The word seduce is from seducere, t lead, and thus the serpent led Eve, Heva, or Virgo, while Virgo preceded Adham or Bootes, and all fall together, dragging a third part of the stars—in reality five-twelfths of the heavens with them; and Shem-shem went down with them too.

Thus the "violent storm heaven and take it by force.

When Samson went down to Timnah to get his wife, a lion met him on the way. He slew the lion, and the next time he went down that way he took honey out of the carcass of the lion made by the bees which had taken the carcass for a hive—something no bee would ever do.

But Astrology explains this very prettily.

Samson got his wives in Philistia or in the borders of the winter months. On his way to the constellation Virgo, in whose soft arms he reposes for one month, he passes through the constellation Leo, and in doing so eclipses its light or kills it. All ancient maps represent Leo with a honey bee flying out of his mouth, it being the period of the year when the honey bee gathers in most of its harvest.

This is very pretty if we study it with a spirit of investigation instead of hatred against those who take it literally. There is much mythology in our Bible, but we can not take it as all mythology without crippling ourselves as logicians. There are spiritual manifestations recorded in it, which, whether true or false, could never have been written except from the presence of spiritual phenomena among the people. No man could have described a steamboat in 1776, neither could any person who had not become familiar with the philosophy of spirit control have written of spirit control. David could not have told Solomon of the Lord, a term used to signify a spirit, writing upon his person, if it had not been done, and before Charles Foster had writings come on his arm, we could not understand a statement of the kind.

In the statement concerning Peter, it seems to me your correspondent has stretched a point. He makes the word Cephas to correspond to the name of the father of Aquarius. I can not understand it that way. I have no doubt that much of the gospel of John was mythological, a mere revamping of Mythraism, but we find the same thing referred to in Matthew 16:17, 18. In this chapter Jesus tells Simon that the matter he had told Jesus was a revelation from the Spirit world; "ho pater mol,"—the father of me; that is, Jesus's spirit father. Then he says, "Thou art Peter (Petros, a rock), and upon this rock will I establish my church and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

The intention evidently was to point out the solid foundation of the church that was to be established by Jesus. There were several churches at the time, the Essenes, the Theraputes, the Pharisees, and others, but none of them was founded on revelations from the spirit world. This was a rock foundation.

Simon was a medium of communication between the two worlds, and by a figure of speech called a synecdoche, he received the same title that was given to the foundation of the church. This interpretation is sealed by the phrase, "the gates of hell"—Hades, the hidden place of the dead, figured by the sepulchre, which Parkhurst tells us had narrow entrances, and were probably closed to keep out wild animals. The gates of the grave or sepulchre shall not prevent the establishment of the church on spirit intercourse, for the so-called dead escape the sepulchre and talk with their loved ones. And they guided the Christians past the destruction of Jerusalem and thus saved them.

In 1 Cor. 10:4, this rock of spirit intercourse is again referred to as having accompanied the Children of Israel through the wilderness, and we are told that rock was Christ, an untranslated word meaning one who is anointed by the spirit world for doing a certain work. On this, see "Christianity as it was," by the writer of this, pages 53-74, where the matter has been argued out at considerable length.

A BIT OF EXPERIENCE.
